<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Title</th>
<th>Subversive law in Ireland, 1879-1920: From 'unwritten law' to the Dáil courts</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Author(s)</td>
<td>Laird, Heather</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Publication date</td>
<td>2005</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Type of publication</td>
<td>Book</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Item downloaded from</td>
<td>http://hdl.handle.net/10468/8165</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Downloaded on 2022-06-27T04:48:34Z
Subversive Law in Ireland, 1879–1920
SUBVERSIVE LAW
IN IRELAND, 1879–1920
From ‘unwritten law’ to the Dáil courts
HEATHER LAIRD
FOUR COURTS PRESS
Múscaill! Corraight a chiodlataigh ghráannal!
Is dubhach an taisd dtínte i dthlaislead;
Cúirt ina sui agus na milte ag triall amn.
Ní cúirt gan acht, gan rachadh, gan rial,
Ná cúirt na gcreach mar do chleacht tú ná anbh,
An chuírt seo ghluais ó shloite séimhe.
Cúirt na dtíre, na mibua 'is na mibéithe.

[Awake and stir! You sleepy head! It's sad that here on your thighs you're stretching when a court is being held and thousands attending; not a court without law or statute or rule, nor a plunderer's court to which you're used, is this court that springs from gentle people — a court for wretches, nobles and females.]

— Brian Merriman

History does nothing, it possesses 'no immense wealth', it 'wages no battles'. It is man, real, living man who does all that, who possesses and fights; history is not, as it were a person apart, using man as a means to achieve its own aims, history is nothing but the activity of man pursuing his aims.

— Marx & Engels
Contents

ABBREVIATIONS 9

PREFACE 11

1 'Secret and unrecognised governments': official law, subversive law and the alternative state 15

2 Writing law(lessness): legal crisis and narrative structure in Emily Lawless's _Harris_ 43

3 'Ride rough-shod': evictions, sheriffs' sales and the anti-hunting agitation 60

4 Consequences and conclusions 103

5 Theories of resistance: an analysis 129

BIBLIOGRAPHY 171

INDEX 181
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Abbreviations</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>app.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>BL</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>BM</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CO</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CSO</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ed.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>eds</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>HC</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>HL</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>IFC</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>IHS</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ir. Jurist</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>IRA</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NLI</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>PRO</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>RIC</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>RP</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SSNCI</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>TCD</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>UCC</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>UCD</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
In a prose piece entitled 'Ireland at the bar', a young James Joyce invoked the image of his Gaelic-speaking namesake, Myles Joyce, speechless and powerless in a British court as a potent metaphor for Anglo-Irish relations:

The figure of this dumbfounded old man, a remnant of a civilization not ours, deaf and dumb, before his judge, is a symbol of the Irish nation at the bar of public opinion. Like him, she is unable to appeal to the modern conscience of England and other countries.

Myles Joyce, the figure at the centre of this metaphor, was one of the men accused of an horrific multiple-murder that had taken place at Maamtrasna, Co. Galway, in August 1882. When the counsel for the prosecution, James Murphy, was summing up for the crown in the trials of Myles Joyce and the other men who were charged with this crime, he commended the three witnesses who had supplied the names of the accused to the authorities: 'It is some salutary sign of the times [... that] the three honest peasants who had lived their simple and homely lives in faith and honesty in that part of the countryside are now communicating with the magistrates and the police. Public assertions of that kind were to become less frequent, however, when it was discovered that not only had the state withheld information that brought into question the credibility of these witnesses and the information they had supplied, but that two of the men sentenced to be hanged were claiming that the third man, Myles Joyce, had no involvement in the murders at Maamtrasna. The editor of the Connaught Telegraph, James Daly, who in the immediate aftermath of the trials had argued that 'the great crime committed by those men deserves the extreme penalty of the law', was by 1884 describing Myles Joyce as a 'murdered victim to the misdoings and miscarriages of that wholesome “British Law”'.

It is through the tragic tale of Myles Joyce, impotent and 'stupefied' in the presence of an oppressive legal system, that James Joyce seeks in ‘Ireland at the bar’ to illustrate the unequal nature of Anglo-Irish power relations.¹

It is hardly surprising that Joyce would have chosen this particular metaphor. By the time ‘Ireland at the bar’ was written in 1907, the official system of law was long established as one of the main mediums for the implementation of English rule in Ireland. During the course of the eighteenth century, the penal laws, aptly described by Declan Kiberd as ‘measures of maniac, racist wish-fulfilment’, had inscribed colonial power relations into a legal system controlled by a settler-dominated magistracy.² The statutes that comprised the penal code sought to stem the economic, political and cultural power of Catholics in Ireland, reducing the majority of the Irish population to the status of legal nonentities. Earlier policies, such as ‘surrender and regrant’, likewise demonstrate the importance that was placed on legal issues, particularly in regard to property ownership, in the colonial consolidation of Ireland. The Irish chiefs who, from the 1540s to the early seventeenth century, entered into ‘surrender and regrant’ agreements were required to give up their rights and lands as defined by Gaelic custom and receive them back from the crown in a form of absolute ownership more compatible with English property law. This policy, though less overtly violent than the later penal laws, nonetheless constituted an aggressive attack on the Gaelic polity and the system of succession and landholding that underpin it and, consequently, functioned as an effective tool in the anglicization of Ireland.

The courtroom also serves as a metaphor for the colonial relationship between Ireland and England in Anthony Trollope’s The Land League, though the relationship conjured up in Trollope’s unfinished Land War narrative is quite different to that envisaged in Joyce’s ‘Ireland at the bar’. The Land League opens with a crisis of law administration that is the result of a widespread refusal to engage with the official system of law. At the centre of the novel, both structurally and thematically, is the trial of Pat Carroll, a tenant-farmer accused of damaging his landlord’s property. The Galway courthouse in which this trial takes place is ‘densely crowded’ and the noise […] of people whispering loudly amongst themselves is from the very beginning disruptive enough to impede proceedings and require an early intervention from the judge.³ By the time the attorney-general has finished his opening remarks, it is clear, however, that what little control the judge initially had over this courtroom has been completely eroded: ‘He called out a word even from the bench in which there was something as to clearing the court; but no attempt to clear the court was made or was apparently possible. The judge’s impotence is paralleled by that of the constables present who form an “avenue” through the courtroom to allow Terry Carroll, the chief witness to the “outrage”, a safe passage to the witness box, but cannot prevent his murder. Notwithstanding the close proximity of these policemen to the murdered witness, not one of them knows who fired the fatal shot. Following these dramatic courtroom scenes, “men were heard to whisper among themselves that the queen’s laws were no longer in force”.⁴

In Trollope’s narrative, the courtroom functions as a metaphor for the relationship between a paralyzed Irish administration and a populace whose response to that administration ranges from defiant disregard to open confrontation. The novel centres on a clash between official law and an alternative system of control. Ironically, Trollope, who died before the official legal system had been further discredited by the publicity surrounding Myles Joyce’s trial, attempted to find narrative closure for his novel in a multiple murder modelled closely on the Maamstrana murders. Following the ‘inhuman massacre’ that is the murder of three generations of one family in Co. Galway, the ‘people’ are forced to conclude that the law, as administered by Government, might be less tyrannical than the law of those who had no law to govern them.⁵

As is acknowledged in The Land League, resistance to an official legal system that Trollope’s fictional peasants were not alone in associating with the conquest of the country, created a space for the establishment of alternative legal concepts and structures that monitored and regulated the behaviour of rural communities. These systems of control included such diverse practices and institutions as boycotting, an ‘unwritten agrarian code’, Repeal Association arbitration courts, Ribbon Association courts, Land League courts, National League courts, United Irish League courts and Dáil courts. Law in Ireland was not only a medium for the implementation of English rule; it was also a fundamental component of anti-colonial resistance, with the concept of an alternative system of control capable of supplanting a despised official law functioning as one of the most sustained threats to successive colonial administrations. The primary focus of this book is subversive law from the Land War period to the establishment of the Dáil courts. More specifically, I explore the extent to which the various practices and institutions that are incorporated within this category mimicked, paralleled, appropriated, parodied, subverted and displaced official law in Ireland.

Subversive law in Ireland could not have been written without the help and support of the subversive elements that are my family, friends and colleagues. The doctoral study upon which it is based was undertaken at University College, Dublin. I wish to thank especially my supervisor Declan Kiberd for his encouragement and guidance. Other scholars also provided inspiration and advice at critical points. Padraig Ó Foley’s enthusiasm for obscure publications on Irish property law confirmed my own. Discussions with Joe Cleary helped sharpen crucial aspects of my central argument. The book has benefited from the intel-

---

¹ Joyce, ‘Ireland at the bar’, 1927. ² Kiberd, Irish drama, 75. ³ Trollope, The Land League, 167.

⁴ Ibid. 264, 265. ⁵ Ibid. 396–397.
'Secret and unrecognised governments': official law, subversive law and the alternative state

In June 1879, the editor of the Freeman's Journal, a mainstream nationalist newspaper that represented the Irish commercial sector and was, therefore, closely aligned with elite anti-colonial nationalist interests, urged nationalist leaders to abandon what he described as a misguided 'policy of illegality':

it would be a terrible responsibility to advise unhappy Irish occupiers to enter on a battle with the law. The law is too strong for them, and the only consequence of a quarrel with it would be utter ruin. When a man's head is in the lion's mouth he must be very circumspect, and as the landlords have the law on their side it behoves the friends of the tenant to be most cautious lest their advocacy should injure those whom they desire to serve.

Notwithstanding warnings that appeared in both this newspaper and the Times; the Irish rural poor did embark on what might best be described as a battle with the law. This battle should not, however, be interpreted, as it is in the passage quoted above, in terms of elite stimulus and subaltern or non-elite response. The meeting at Westport that prompted this warning took place in the context of a rural agitation that was developing a clearly recognizable pattern and, consequently, even from the perspective of officialdom, had become increasingly difficult to dismiss as acts of random crime. It was this agitation that was to become the driving force of a crisis of administration in Ireland in the 1880s and was to define and shape the structure and movement of politics during much of this period.

In a pamphlet published a year after the meeting at Westport, John Devoy, an ex-Fenian, addressed those who had accused him of neglecting the primary need of the nation — advancing the cause of political independence: Devoy responded to this charge by pointing out that the energizing force behind the present land agitation was not a coalition of nationalists and Fenians, but the people themselves, and all the efforts of all the public men in Ireland combined... could not have prevented it in one form or another. Some months before the publication of Devoy’s pamphlet, a report that appeared in the Freeman’s Journal concerning a meeting at Clifden gives evidence to such claims, demonstrating the extent to which the Irish rural poor were ensuring that issues of relevance to them were being positioned at the very centre of nationalist politics. In response to the demands of those attending the meeting, one of the speakers, we are told, was forced to abandon the proposed focus of his talk, home rule, and deal specifically with issues of landlordism and rent. In the decade that followed the meetings at Westport and Clifden, sustained resistance to official law and its institutions was to become a central tactic of the battle forewarned by the Freeman’s Journal. This resistance was not only a crucial factor in the transformation of land ownership in Ireland, but was to point to the existence of an alternative system of control capable of replacing without ne-necessarily replicating the official legal system.

In his memoirs, Ireland under the Land League (1892), Clifford Lloyd provides an account of his attempts to counteract this tactic. Lloyd’s memoirs comprise of a study of two conflicting systems of control operating in Ireland during the 1880s, demonstrating the extent to which popular dissatisfaction towards one of these systems—official law—allowed for its displacement by the other—subversive or alternative law. Lloyd, described in the Introduction to these memoirs as a ‘loyal Irishman’ who had been given the ‘duty of restoring order in a succession of disturbed localities’, was one of a number of employees of the crown sent to Ireland during the 1870s and 1880s who were chosen primarily for the experience they had gained in the colonial administration of Africa or India.5
Suffering from recurrent malaria or what was more commonly known as ‘jungle fever’, Lloyd was assigned in 1881 to the newly established position of special resident magistrate and was to become a forceful advocate of the more decentralized system of law administration that post represented.6 For Margaret O’Callaghan in British high politics and a nationalist Ireland, Lloyd shared one characteristic with this ‘succession of old African and Indian hands’: a ‘deep inability to recall that Ireland was part of the United Kingdom with representatives in parliament, and not a far-flung colony’.7 Lloyd’s own description of his work in Ireland, however, tells of his frustrated attempts to transform the localities to which he had been assigned ‘into a condition more becoming to a portion of the United Kingdom’ and his growing realization that this may not be possible.8 In Ireland under the Land League, Lloyd argued that Ireland should be pacified through extraordinary measures so that it could ultimately be ruled under ‘ordinary’ law. Nonetheless, he was keen to warn his readership that it might be necessary to modify ‘ordinary’ law when applying it to Ireland in order to avoid the reintroduction of extraordinary measures. In other words, in Lloyd’s analysis, extra measures would no longer be required if ‘ordinary’ law in Ireland always contained elements of extraordinary legislation. Referring to events that had taken place in Derry before the passing of the Crimes Act, Lloyd described how Orangemen, counterdemonstrating a meeting held by the Land League, were prevented under British law from interfering with the League’s right of public meeting. For Lloyd, attempts to rule Ireland under the same laws as governed England could have ludicrous results. Enforcing democratic rights in Derry, Lloyd argued, had led to the following situation: ‘the armed forces of the crown standing round and protecting a gathering of rebels preaching treason’.9

Prior to taking up the post of special resident magistrate, Lloyd was based in India where it was relatively common practice for officials to write retrospectively of their involvement in counteracting rural disturbances. William Edwards’s Personal adventures during the Indian rebellion in Rohilkund, Fustaff, and Oudh (1858) and Mark Thornhill’s Personal adventures and experiences of a magistrate during the rise, progress, and suppression of the Indian Mutiny (1884), for example, provided accounts of peasant violence during the Indian Mutiny and the role played by the authors in the subsequent containment of that violence. The trajectory from disorder to order that is mapped out in Thornhill’s more famous memoirs is largely absent from Ireland under the Land League. In this latter text, Clifford Lloyd defined his role in Ireland’s ‘disturbed localities’ as more than simply restoring an area to law and order. For Lloyd, it was not people and property that had to be protected from the ‘lawless spirit’, but the concept and functioning of British law itself. Whether in Longford where ‘generally the law was trampled under foot’, or in Limerick with its ‘wanton acts of rebellion against the law and the constituted authority in the land’, Lloyd set himself the task of reinstating established law, arguing that ‘if the law does not show itself to be the master of the people, the people will quickly show themselves to be mas-

---

1 Devoy, John Devoy as the political agitator, 4. 2 Editorial, Freeman’s Journal (2 September 1879). Mitchell Henry was the speaker referred to in this editorial. 3 ‘Introduction to Lloyd, Ireland under the Land League, ix. vi. Other examples include Major General Sir Robert Butler, also known as ‘Buller of the Bush’, who was assigned to the post of special commissioner in 1886 and Sir Joseph West Ridgeway, a former commander of the Indian contingent of the Afghan Frontier Commission, who became permanent under-secretary to A.J. Ballance in 1877. 5 In 1881 and 1884, six special resident magistrates were given responsibility for co-ordinating and directing the activities of the crown forces—the police, resident magistrates and the military—in a particular group of counties. Under this system, counties considered to be the most affected by the Land War were divided into six divisions; each under the control of a special resident magistrate. In 1881, these special resident magistrates were replaced by four divisional magistrates. A year later, a further divisional magistrate was appointed to bring the entire country under the system, which was gradually integrated with the RJC chain of command. The divisional system was discontinued in 1888.

7 O’Callaghan, British high politics and a nationalist Ireland, 88. 8 Lloyd, Ireland under the Land League, 98. 9 Ibid., 13.
ters of it. It was Lloyd's belief in the fundamental importance of this task that motivated his every action. A number of men arrested for their involvement in a riot in Kilmallock, for example, were released after spending seven days in jail on remand. Lloyd, justifying his 'leniency' in the handling of this case, explained to the reader that it would have been quite useless returning the prisoners for trial. That course would have only resulted in the law being further defeated and discredited. Unwilling to seek convictions in the knowledge that in Ireland 'trial before a jury was but to advertise the weakness of the law', Lloyd, a member of the English Bar, responded to the people's refusal to participate in the institutions of the law by disregarding these institutions himself.10

Public displays of disaffection towards official law were common during the period Lloyd wrote about in Ireland under the Land League. In the aftermath of the Protection of Person and Property Act of 1881, various organizations (Political Prisoners' Fund, the Ladies' Prisoners' Aid Society, the Political Prisoners' Aid Society, the Irish World Prisoners' Aid Society, the Political Prisoners' Sustentation Fund, the Commercial Men's Political Prisoners' Aid Society and the Suspects' Sustentation Fund) openly appealed for food and funds for those who had been detained without trial.11 In December 1881, Margaret Dineen, secretary of the Ladies' Land League, wrote to E.D. Gray, editor of the Freeman's Journal, to inform him that notice had been given to the Ladies' Land League to cease to collect for the Suspects' Sustentation Fund under threat of imprisonment. Dineen went on to claim that the police, under the direction of Clifford Lloyd, had warned the publicans of Ballylanders that they would lose their licences if they continued to put up shutters when arrests were made in the town and did not 'abstain in future from manifesting the least sign of sympathy for anyone arrested under the Coercion Act'.12

Reports that appeared in both national and local newspapers at the time suggest that the saving of crops belonging to suspected Land League activists arrested under the terms of this act were occasions of communal festivity. In November and December 1881, the Freeman's Journal provided regular coverage of this collective crop saving under the title 'Sympathy with suspects'.13 These reports could be accused of exaggerating the numbers of those who gathered in the fields of the 'suspects', but, ultimately, their importance lies in the extent to which they reveal the ceremonial and carnivalesque quality of these events—the processions, the music, the spectacle:

Yesterday the town of Rhode, Edenderry, presented a busy appearance consequent on the assembling of the people to secure the crops of Messrs. Bernard and James Ennis, at present confined in Naas jail. Seven thousand men and over four hundred carts were formed in procession, headed by the original Land League pipers, Davy Woods, in an ass's phreton, tastefully decorated with imitation spears. He was dressed in a grotesque uniform, viz., green tunic, white breeches, top boots, and a tall white cone-shaped hat, with a green and orange band. All present wore some national emblem [...] The baby boy (nine months old) of one of the suspects was seated on the first load of potatoes drawn home.14

In its coverage of the events that took place at Edenderry, the Leinster Leader likewise draws our attention to such details as Davy Woods's phreton, which in this paper is described as 'surmounted with imitation spears, having orange and green pennons at the pike-ends'. Over six thousand men including a large number of farm labourers are reported by the Leinster Leader as having been present that day. Two thousand labourers, we are told, followed the phreton through the town and paraded the army by marching in military fashion while carrying their 'grapes' in rifle fashion'.

Described in the Freeman's Journal as 'one of the most remarkable demonstrations which have marked the history of the land agitation since its inception', the ploughing of the jailed C.S. Parnell's land at Avondale was depicted as a similarly festive event marked by feasting, music, laughter and the symbolic inversion of social hierarchies:

An idea of the spectacle may be obtained when we mention that [...] there were no less than six hundred carts engaged, and [...] no fewer than one hundred and eighty-three ploughs [...] Viewed from a distance as they traversed the extensive field from end to end, decorated with green ribbons and laurels, the horses and ploughmen presented an appearance which was singularly striking and picturesque [...] The proceedings were witnessed by thousands of spectators, whose frequent cheers lent encouragement to the volunteer ploughmen and carters [...] The excellent brass band of Gorey attended and played an admirable selection of national music during the day, and the efforts of 'Parnell's own band', of Rathdrum, were not less efficient or praiseworthy [...] Great amusement was caused by a procession of a rather novel nature which passed round the field several times. It consisted of a dung-cart, on which was fixed an effigy of 'the last landlord', followed by a considerable crowd, who indulged their facetious propensities to the utmost extent against the class which the wretched looking figure before them was supposed to typify. [A] large four-pronged fork was driven through the effigy amid groans and cheers from the assembled gathering.

The events narrated in this passage are characterized by a curious mixture of respect for authority and playful irreverence. The volunteer ploughmen and carters who travelled, we are informed, from Cos. Wicklow, Wexford, Carlow and Dublin, ploughed land belonging to Charles Stuart Parnell, a member of the landlord class, and then undermined the authority of that class by gathering to laugh and jeer at the occupant of the passing dung-cart. In his work on popular festive forms such as carnival, Mikhail Bakhtin outlined one of the principle characteristics of these occasions as the 'humbeling, debunking, or debasing of whatever is lofty by the lowly, as when beggars insulted kings or lay brothers mocked the manners of the abbot of a monastery'. This practice of 'reverse hierarchy' is evident in the actions of those present at Edenderry and Avondale. Unlike the prescriptive or ritual inversions that Bakhtin described, however, these events were a reaction to a specific political situation. The collective saving of crops and ploughing of fields belonging to those who had been imprisoned under official law functioned as an act of defiance against that law and the repressive legislation it had come to depend upon. Elements of what Bakhtin referred to in Rabelais and his world as unofficial/non-official or folk culture were shaping Irish resistance to the colonial state and its legal institutions.

Notwithstanding Clifford Lloyd's stated unambiguous desire to reinstate the authority of official law in Ireland, the account of this task given in Ireland under the Land League reveals a conflictual approach to the concept of law in the Irish context. Lloyd's memoirs close with the following dramatic assertion: 'Blood the Land League wanted, and blood it caused to flow, with a cruelty and savageness unsurpassed in history.' This last-minute attempt to reduce the threat to official law in Ireland to acts of irrational and barbarous violence ultimately fails to counteract an earlier acknowledgment of a rationale through which such 'savageness' could be interpreted as just retribution. Employed to uphold a legal system that had acquired the aura of universal significance, yet forced to acknowledge the systematic nature of the threat to the workings of this law, Lloyd often undermined his own attempts to define the conflict in Ireland in terms of order and disorder. Lloyd's text contains countless references to the 'lawless spirit', 'criminality', 'champions of disorder', 'social anarchy' and the 'triumphant maintenance of disorder over law'. While such words and phrases were designed to indicate the immorality and, perhaps more importantly, the illegality of Irish agrarian violence, Lloyd's desire to educate those in England who, he believed, had failed to grasp the seriousness of the situation, often led to his acknowledgment of the extent to which this 'lawlessness' and 'disorder' functioned as an alternative system of law and order. Ireland under the Land League provides an account of Lloyd's attempts to re-establish official law in parts of Ireland where not only the majority of the people dissatisfied with this law, but where, he acknowledges, official law had been supplanted by an alternative system of control that contained elements both similar and dissimilar to the British model. The challenge for the state, Lloyd's narrative makes clear, was to counteract opposing concepts of law rather than to repress 'lawlessness'.

Just over ten years previously, George Campbell, a Scotsman who had worked as a settlement officer in the Punjab, a judicial commissioner in Oudh and a chief commissioner in the Central Provinces, outlined in his analysis of Irish property relations what he believed to be one of the most sustained threats to colonial administrations in Ireland: a persistent belief in the possibility of alternatives to an official law whose legal frameworks did not always correspond to the realities of Irish life. Campbell's The Irish land traces the emergence of oppositional law in Ireland to the official rejection of the Brehon laws and the failure to incorporate these laws into the 'British' legal system. For Campbell, it was the very attempt to completely substitute 'British' modes of legality for those that existed prior to conquest that ensured this process of substitution was never in fact completed. The rejection of the Brehon laws, in Campbell's view, had guaranteed not only the incomplete erosion of these earlier modes of legality, but their potential to function as a particularly potent form of resistance. Pre-conquest law, Campbell argued, lived on in the form of custom and worked to undermine the operations of official law. Frederick Wymouth Gibbs, in his study of the workings and limits of law in Ireland, was likewise to comment on this process of incomplete erosion, offering the following guidelines to those whose vested interests lay in the containment of the fragmented remains of earlier concepts of legality:

The only mode of estimating the influence of an early custom upon subsequent generations is to trace the custom by historical evidence from generation to generation, to observe how far it becomes disintegrated by the action of new forces, and to note the time when the fragments can be traced only in popular sentiment. Two questions of statesmanship may then arise—How far these fragments will resist further disintegration, and how far they offer elements fitted for new combinations?24

Though they differed in their summations of what existed outside official law—an entire system or the fragments of a system—Gibbs's and Campbell's work on property law and custom had led them to a similar conclusion: English law may be the only law that receives official recognition in Ireland, but this does not mean that alternative concepts of legality do not exist. For Gibbs, earlier modes of legality lingered on as the fragmented and shadowy Other of English law. Close observation of these 'fragments' was advised as they were capable of functioning as resistance in two distinct ways. They could 'resist further disintegration' and therefore work to demonstrate the limitations of dominant modes of legality or they could 'offer elements fitted for new combinations' that threaten to replace these dominant modes. In Campbell's writings, alternative concepts of law, at least in the context of property and land, were in practice dominant, shaping the thoughts and actions of all who live in Ireland.

When reading Campbell and Gibbs on law in Ireland, we are forced to confront the question of whether the Brehon laws could have continued to exist in the form of custom until the mid to late nineteenth century. In the debates that accompanied the state-sponsored project in the latter half of that century to transcribe, edit, and translate the Brehon laws, repeated reference is made to the contemporary relevance of those laws. The proposal that James Todd and Charles Graves submitted to the Government in 1852 seeking financial backing for that project vindicates the expenses that will be incurred on the grounds that the Brehon laws 'may be found to have important bearings upon the existing condition of society in Ireland.' The project, it is stated, would not only assist the historian and philologist, but also the politician 'who has studied and been perplexed by the anomalies of Irish character'. In a speech before the Social Science Association to mark the commencement of the publication of The ancient laws and institutes of Ireland, Lord John O'Hagan, whom Gladstone was later to appoint head of the Irish Land Commission, justified the translation project on the grounds that the Brehon laws 'manifest the principles and peculiar notions which guided the Irish in their dealings with the land, and which, to this hour, have not ceased to operate, through dim tradition, on our actual state.'25 The editors of the second volume of this publication, W. Neilson Hancock and Thaddeus O'Mahony, allude to the afterlife of the Senchus Mor, one of the earliest examples of the Brehon laws, in such practices as the sending home of remittances by Irish emigrants.26 Frederick Engels, who took a keen interest in the translation process, was adamant that this system of law, though 'forcibly broken up by the English [...] still lives today in the consciousness of the people' and in such customs as the rundale system of landholding and faction fighting.27 Another commentator, David Fitzgerald, was, like George Campbell, to find a much wider contemporary significance for the old Irish legal system, arguing that 'traditions and ideas derived from it continue to influence the mass of the Irish people today.' Among the 'survivals' referred to by Fitzgerald was a custom of landholding that resulted in the deep-lying feeling of the Irish farmer that so long as he pays rent for the land he has a right to live on it, and that to evict him from his holding is in a certain sense to deprive him of his lawful property.28 The continued presence of an absence may, however, have been just as significant as the survival of such fragments of earlier modes of legality. What Campbell, Gibbs, Fitzgerald and Lloyd observed in Ireland was, perhaps, less a tangible system of law directly derived from the Brehon laws, than a space outside official law that this legal system had once inhabited. Throughout the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, this space was filled by various alternative courts or tribunals (Repeal Association arbitration courts, Ribbon Association courts, Land League courts, National League courts, United Irish League courts, Dáil courts, etc.), boycotting, an 'unwritten agrarian code', or a mixture of these and other elements.

In response to Campbell's thesis and my reworking of this thesis, it could be argued that alternative forms of control outside official law are not always a by-product of conquest. It would be possible, for example, to cite the work of the English social historian, E.P. Thompson, in particular his notion of a customary law or moral economy, and thereby demonstrate that unofficial forms of law are not unique to colonies. In Whigs and hunters, Thompson talks of the foresters in early eighteenth-century England who responded to the incursions of 'improving' gentility on the commons by killing protected deer and prominently displayed the dead animals' bodies. The deer-piecers, Thompson tells us, were 'enforcing the definition of rights to which the "country people" had become habituated, and also [...] resisting the private emparkments which encroached upon their tillage, their firing and their grazing. While there can be no doubt that these foresters were, as Thompson claims, appealing to a system of justice separate to official law, a closer examination of Thompson’s work reveals significant differences between the workings of both official law and unofficial law in England and Ireland.

Whip and hunters tells the story of a Whig oligarchy in the early eighteenth century that introduced oppressive laws to serve its own class interests. Thompson makes it clear, however, that the legal system at this time always allow rulers oppress the ruled.

For Thompson, therefore, the rise of the Rule of Law in eighteenth-century England should be traced to the desire to distinguish official law from naked or unmediated force. An appearance of impartiality was essential to this process and creating that appearance meant that a legal system had to be installed that could impose inhibitions upon the actions of the ruling classes and allow for occasional just outcomes. It was this possibility of justice, according to Thompson, that explains the willingness of the lower classes in the eighteenth century to engage with a legal order that they recognized as being most of the time blatantly tipped in favor of ruling-class interests. Customary law did not cease to exist as a result of this process, but as the eighteenth century advanced it did become increasingly subordinate to official law.

In contrast, it would be difficult to pinpoint any attempt during the same period in Ireland to create the appearance of legal impartiality. The penal code that operated during the eighteenth century protected Protestant interests and was, therefore, ‘evidently partial and unjust’, while ‘British’ law was popularly interpreted as a foreign imposition that had displaced an earlier legal system. The rise of the Rule of Law that E.P. Thompson charts in England was not experienced in eighteenth-century Ireland. Consequently, the hierarchical structure Thompson employs to describe how official law topped a pyramid of systems of control is not applicable to the Irish context. The relationship between official law and other forms of control was far more antagonistic in Ireland, where, at times of heightened tension, unofficial law threatened to supplant official law. It is not the existence of multiple legal orders, therefore, that differentiates Ireland from England, but the nature of the struggles within these orders.

Traces of alternative courts and other unofficial legal practices that can be found in numerous official and non-official accounts of rural Ireland provide evidence that alternative law has functioned as a fundamental component of Irish agrarian agitation since at least the emergence of Whiteboyism in the 1760s. In The Irish National League and the “unwritten law”, Donald Jordan offers a brief overview of these traces, drawing our attention to Select Committee Reports from 1825, 1831-2, 1852 and 1871. The Select Committee of 1825, for example, was informed by the Cork administrator of the Insurrection Act of 1814 that previously there had been committees sitting when there was some great work to be done, as the burning of a house, or the murder of a man; the matter was discussed and decided there. The archives of the Department of Irish Folklore at UCD contain written records of oral testimony concerning agrarian violence that occurred during the same period. Much of the violence recounted in this testimony is interpreted as just retribution in response to obvious injustices or acts that transgress accepted norms of behaviour. In relation to a system of justice outside official law, it is also possible to point to George Cornwall Lewis’ references to ‘non-apparent’ tribunals in On local disturbances in Ireland and on the Irish church question and W. Stuart Trench’s detailed description of his 1851 trial before the Ribbon Society in his Realities of Irish life.

Trench, a land agent in Ireland from 1843 to at least the publication of Realities of Irish life in 1868, chose to centre this narrative, both structurally and thematically, on a Ribbon trial that sentenced him to death. In 1851 Trench received information that ‘I had been formally tried by a judge and jury in a large barn at one of the tenants’ houses; that I had been found guilty of being “an exterminator”’ (though I had not evicted a single tenant). One of the men present at this trial later outlined to Trench the procedures that led to and followed the judgement:

83 Thompson, Whig and Hunter, 64–5; 29 ibid, 286. 30 It should be noted that Thompson’s analysis of the rise of the Rule of Law has been emulated by both Marxist and postcolonial theorists. In Marxist writings, the doctrine of the Rule of Law inhibits the arbitrary exercise of power, but, in doing so, legitimates existing structures of political domination. By celebrating the former function of the Rule of Law, Thompson is open to the charge of defending a philosophy that obscures power relations. See Collins, Marxism and law, 124–5, 130, 144–5; Horowitz, The Rule of Law: an unqualified good?, 66–7. Ramjet Guha responds to Thompson’s claim that the rise of the Rule of Law was a cultural achievement of universal significance (ibid) by denying the notion that the Rule of Law as described by Thompson ever existed in the colonial setting.

84 For further analysis of Whiteboyism’s reliance on alternative concepts and forms of justice, see O’Sullivan, Captain Rock in prison, 48–9; Beattie’s Passions and power, 31; Jordan, The Irish National League and the “unwritten law”, 192–5; 31 Minutes of evidence taken before the land reform committee appointed in 1823 to examine into the nature and extent of the disturbances which have prevailed in those districts of Ireland which are now subject to the Insurrection Act, pp. 1830 (502); J.C. Breden, Ireland 1714–1868, 71; pp. 74–5. Caddell in Jordan, The Irish National League and the “unwritten law”, 193–4; See IFC MSS 1479/4, 485, IFC MSS 7682, IFC MSS 485; 35 Lewis, On local disturbances in Ireland, 327–8, 396–9. 36 Trench, Realities of Irish life, 417.
Ish Thompson employs to describe how was, therefore, advanced and could impose inhibitions upon the actions of the ruling classes and allow for Thompson, the "unwritten law".

For Thompson, therefore, the rise of the Rule of Law in eighteenth-century England should be traced to a desire to distinguish official law from naked or unmediated force. An appearance of impartiality was essential to this process and creating that appearance meant that a legal system had to be installed that could impose inhibitions upon the actions of the ruling classes and allow for occasional just outcomes. It was this possibility of justice, according to Thompson, that explains the willingness of the lower classes in the eighteenth century to engage with a legal order that they recognized as being most of the time blatantly tipped in favor of ruling-class interests. Customary law did not cease to exist as a result of this process, but as the eighteenth century advanced it did become increasingly subordinate to official law.

In contrast, it would be difficult to pinpoint any attempt during the same period in Ireland to create the appearance of legal impartiality. The penal code that operated during the eighteenth century protected Protestant interests and was, therefore, "evidently partial and unjust", while "British" law was popularly interpreted as a foreign imposition that had displaced an earlier legal system. The rise of the Rule of Law that E.P. Thompson charts in England was not experienced in eighteenth-century Ireland. Consequently, the hierarchical structure Thompson employs to describe how official law toppled a pyramid of systems of control is not applicable to the Irish context. The relationship between official law and other forms of control was far more antagonistic in Ireland, where, at times of heightened tension, unofficial law threatened to supplant official law. It is not the existence of multiple legal orders, therefore, that differentiates Ireland from England, but the nature of the struggles within these orders.

Traces of alternative courts and other subversive legal practices that can be found in numerous official and non-official accounts of rural Ireland provide evidence that alternative law has functioned as a fundamental component of Irish agrarian agitation since at least the emergence of Whiteboyism in the 1760s. In "The Irish National League and the "unwritten law"", Donald Jordan offers a brief overview of these traces, drawing our attention to Select Committee Reports from 1825, 1832-2, 1835 and 1871. The Select Committee of 1825, for example, was informed by the Cork administrator of the Insurrection Act of 1824 that previously there had been "committees sitting when there was some great work to be done, as the burning of a house, or the murder of a man; the matter was discussed and decided there". The archives of the Department of Irish Folklore at UCD contain written records of oral testimony concerning agrarian violence that occurred during the same period. Much of the violence recounted in this testimony is interpreted as just retribution in response to obvious injustices or acts that transgress accepted norms of behavior. In relation to a system of justice outside official law, it is also possible to point to George Cornwell Lewis's references to "non-apparent courts" in On local disturbances in Ireland and on the Irish church question and W. Stewart Trench's detailed description of his 1851 trial before the Ribbon Society in his Realities of Irish life.

Trench, a land agent in Ireland from 1843 to at least the publication of Realities of Irish life in 1868, chose to centre this narrative, both structurally and thematically, on a Ribbon trial that sentenced him to death. In 1851, Trench received information that "I had been formally tried by a judge and jury in a large barn at one of the tenants' houses; that I had been found guilty of being an exterminator" (though I had not evicted a single tenant). One of the men present at this trial later outlined to Trench the procedures that led to and followed the judgement:

For further analysis of Whiteboyism's reliance on alternative concepts and forms of justice, see O'Sullivan, "Captain Rock in print", 38-40; Beaumont's tenants and power. 40 Jordan, "The Irish National League and the "unwritten law"", 79-96; Jordan, "Minutes of evidence taken before the local sub-committee appointed in [1824] to examine into the manner and extent of the disturbances which have prevailed in this district of Ireland which are now subject to the consideration of the Select Committee", 377-94 (1921), 1914, p. 43. 46 Cited in Jordan, "The Irish National League and the "unwritten law"", 197. 47 See IFC MSS 631, IFC MSS 762, IFC MSS 576, IFC MSS 766, IFC MSS 656. 48 Lewis, On local disturbances in Ireland, 197-98; 390-91. 49 Trench, Realities of Irish life, 117.
Notice had been sent around a short time before to some of the most active and trusted Ribbonmen that 'Trench was to be tried' on a certain night. The parties [...] did not confine themselves to the orthodox number of twelve, as I believe there were fifteen or sixteen present [...] The house where the trial took place was a large barn, in which was placed a long table, forms were arranged for seats, and plenty of whiskey was supplied by a barefooted girl in attendance.

According to Trench's informant, a member of the Ribbon jury stated that he would 'never consent to his death until he [Trench] be fairly warned first; it is the rule and the law, and notice I say he must get'. Consequently, notices announcing the verdict were posted on the outside walls of three Catholic churches and Trench was regarded in the locality as 'a criminal condemned to die'. Trench was keen to point out that his trial was not an isolated incident: 'It was well known [...] that several gentlemen were under sentence of death.' One of these men, an 'improving' estate manager who had established a model farm on land from which tenants had possibly been evicted, was shot shortly after receiving a threatening notice warning him that his trial had taken place. Paddy McArdle, a bailiff who worked closely with Trench, was also tried by the Ribbon Society. A number of men 'sat upon him' in a public-house at Carickmacross. According to information Trench received, those present 'did not enter upon Paddy's trial with the usual formalities of the Ribbon code' as his means of employment was such an obvious transgression of 'unwritten law' that it guaranteed a guilty verdict.35

In Clifford Lloyd's later account of clashing systems of control, those given the task of upholding official law in Ireland found that anyone who co-operated with the crown forces by either working within the institutions of the law or providing food, transport or accommodation for representatives of the crown, had transgressed against a popular-based and therefore more powerful means of monitoring behaviour. While the RIC were unable to rent transport in Kilmallock and, consequently, were 'almost powerless to act on an emergency outside the town',36 the 'people no more sought redress at the magistrate's court, but applied to that of the Land League for the adjustment of their disputes and the redress of their grievances, real and imaginary'.37 Lloyd noted on a number of occasions that members of the rural community who followed the dictates of the official legal system could be publicly denounced as transgressors and dealt with as criminals under the 'unwritten law', while it was almost impossible to punish those who defied official law under the ordinary administration of that law. Widespread disengagement with official law, Lloyd was forced to acknowledge, was less a symptom of lawlessness than an indication of the existence of alternative legal authorities.

Although based on what in his opinion was a twisted set of values, Lloyd found that a number of aspects of this alternative legal system replicated or were at least close relatives of the 'British' legal system and could, therefore, be easily translated into the terms of English law. The court system associated with local branches of the Land League and the National League which took over from the Land League in 1882, for example, was patterned on its official counterpart and adopted the language and some of the structures of official legal practice. In 1885, the Tory lord lieutenant of Ireland, the Earl of Carnarvon, outlined in a cabinet memorandum the 'formal' attributes of these 'informal' courts:

the greatest mischief lay in the informal courts which the League established, which assumed to revise and judge the relations of landlord and tenant, to regulate differences between tenants, to decide even beyond these limits upon the right and wrong of boycotting in particular instances. And when I say 'informal' courts, perhaps I should say 'formal', for they were formal in every respect except that they were secret [...] They were regularly constituted, went into evidence on each side in a regular manner, and under a system of carefully drawn rules, proceeded by written records, and were in complete communication with the Central Body in Dublin.40

League courts, as Donald Jordan points out in 'The Irish National League and the "unwritten law"', summoned the defendants and witnesses, heard the cases, weighed the evidence, issued judgments and assigned penalties.41 The executive committees of local branches of the League were commonly required to sit in judgement on cases, although juries comprised of members of the community could also be empanelled. If the executive committee was unable to reach a decision, cases were sometimes referred to the Central Branch in Dublin, which, according to Donald Jordan, 'also acted as a court of appeal to review cases or investigate charges of abuse by local branches'.42

Systematic and sustained threat to official law at this time was not, however, confined to institutions that paralleled in their proceedings and proce-dared those they were intended to subvert. In chapters 4 and 6 of Ireland under the Land League, Lloyd commented on the case of Patrick Berkery, a boycotted farmer and publican, who was being punished by means substantially different to anything that could be found within British state institutions. Berkery, who had taken over an evicted holding, was eventually compelled by pressure of the boycott to leave the locality. Convinced he was witnessing the world quite literally turned ‘upside-down’, the bewildered Lloyd told of an interview he conducted with two boycotted men who were suspected in the locality of having paid their rent, but ‘indignantly’ assured Lloyd that ‘they were quite innocent’, and had not paid it for two years. As Lloyd concluded from these and other encounters, alternative assertions of right and wrong were not restricted to the subversive court system established by the Land League and National League.

Extreme social ostracism and isolation first came to the attention of the world media when it was enacted as a strategy of the Land War against Lord Erne’s land agent, Captain Charles Boycott, in Co. Mayo in 1880. Indeed, its success as a weapon in that particular case led to the adoption of the agent’s name for the tactic. In a letter to the Freeman’s Journal in 1882, Earl Fitzwilliam, one of the founder members of the Property Defence Association, outlined the damaging implications of boycotting:

> When a man is under the ban of the League no man may speak to him, no one may work for him; he may neither buy nor sell; he may neither buy nor sell; he is not allowed to go to his ordinary place of worship or send his children to school. The horses of those who are ‘boycotted’ are not allowed to be shod; their cattle are mutilated; their lives are menaced, and have often been taken.

While boycotting was one of the main modes of Irish popular resistance during the period of the 1880s, this practice was by no means unique to Ireland. As pointed out by H.A. Taintgen in his analysis of the sociogenesis of the boycott in Ireland, boycotting has been and continues to be employed across the globe by people who have realized that law and justice are not always the same thing. In India, the shudh band (social boycott) is referred to by Gyan Pandey as a time-honoured weapon that at periods of heightened social tension, as was experienced in India in the early 1920s, was one of the more effective forms of resistance at the disposal of the rural poor. Towards the end of 1919, Pandey tells us, ‘certain tahudars [large landlords] of Pratapgarh who were deemed guilty of severe exactions or other oppressive acts found themselves up against such “strikes” by the villagers’.

In India, what this form of boycotting amounted to in practice was the withdrawal of certain services considered essential. During the Decoy riots, for example, it was resolved by the inhabitants of Kallam in the Poona district that ‘any person cultivating fields belonging to Guzars (moneylenders) or serving them, will be denied service by the village barber, washerman, carpenter, ironsmith, shoemaker and other Ballitas (village servants)’. In both Ireland and India, those who failed to co-operate with a boycott were placing themselves and their families under the threat of boycotting.

Distinctions, however, can be formed between the workings of boycotting in these two colonial settings. In India, many nationalist leaders (including Gandhi) insisted on an opposition between ‘social boycott’ and ‘political boycott’. The latter of these, the best-known example of which was the boycott of British-made goods, had the full support of the nationalist movement, while the rural poor were urged to refrain from partaking in the former. In the words of Gandhi, we should influence our opponents by kindness, not by using physical force nor stopping their water supply or the services of the barber and the washerman. During the early 1880s, when boycotting was widespread in many parts of Ireland, no such distinction existed. In the autumn of 1880, C.S. Parnell, addressing a meeting in Ennis, openly advocated the systematic boycotting of those who had committed the long-established ‘crime’ of ‘land-grabbing’:

> When a man takes a farm from which another has been evicted, you must show him on the roadside when you meet him, you must show him in the streets of the town, you must show him at the shop-counter, you must show him in the fair and at the marketplace, and even in the house of worship, by leaving him severely alone, by putting him into a sort of moral condenation, by isolating him from the rest of his kind as if he were a leper of old, you must show him your detestation of the crime he has committed, and you may depend upon it if the population of a county in Ireland carry on this doctrine, that there will be no

---

41 Lloyd, Ireland under the Land League, 79. In The fall of landlords in Ireland, 1909, M. Davitt cited a letter that contains a similar declaration of innocence. This letter, which is addressed to the Honorable Land League, was sent by a tenant-farmer in Mayo who paid his rent because he did not see there was a law against it. Asking the Land League to forward him a copy to put in his window, he promised ‘as God is my judge I will never lowest the crime’.

43 Taintgen, ‘The boycott in the Irish civilising process’, 86.

44 Cited in Radhakrishna Guha, Elementary aspects of peasant insurgency in colonial India, 1979. As Guha makes clear in Dominance without hegemony, the caste system which operated in Indian society ensured that the withdrawal of such services functioned as an extremely effective form of punishment. This injunction against social boycott was one of Gandhi’s instructions to the peasants of the United Provinces in February 1919. See Gandhi, Cited works of Mahatma Gandhi, vol. 10, note 49. Indeed, according to Radhakrishna Guha, social boycott became important enough to call for Gandhi’s intervention against and again - about ten times - between March 1920 and February 1921. Guha, Dominance without hegemony, 122.
man so full of avarice, so lost to shame, as to dare the public opinion of all right-thinking men within the country and to transgress your unwritten code of laws.

In order to explain these discrepancies, we should turn to the work of the Indian scholars who go by the title of the Subaltern Studies group and, in particular, to their critique of anti-colonial nationalism. This critique centres on the relationship between a nationalist movement that claimed to be vertical in nature and the popular struggles of subaltern or non-elite groups. In India, we are told, all classes, the zemindar (landlord) to the peasantry, were urged to unite in a pan-class alliance against foreign rule in the creation of the nation-state. Jawaharlal Nehru, for example, was to locate the strength of the main nationalist party, the Indian National Congress Party, in its ability to ‘speak for India as a whole [...] That is to say what it demands is not for any particular group or community but for the nation as a whole’. What this all-embracing philosophy tended to amount to in practice, however, was a nationalist leadership that was often resolute in its defence of landlordism and repeatedly called upon the peasantry and working class to mobilize in campaigns in which their specific class interests were unlikely to be represented. According to Ranajit Guha, a founder member of the Subaltern Studies group, the Indian anti-colonial nationalist movement was unable to break away from its symbiosis with landlordism and complicity with many forms of feudal oppression, including the appropriation of the peasant’s surplus by means of quasi-feudal tenancies. Consequently, with all its concern to involve the peasantry in nationalist politics, it could not bring itself to include the struggle against rents in its programs.

Thus Gandhi, who identified himself with the rural poor in the clothes he wore and the food he ate, was to warn the peasantry about the dangers of unpatriotic action against their landlord ‘brothers’.

common interpretation emphasizes the communal or ‘pre-modern’ characteristics of boycotting. Janet K. TeBrake, for example, argues that the success of the boycott depended upon the involvement and co-operation of all members of the community who were bound together by familial or communal ties. Boycotting, she points out, could only be effective if everyone was willing to partake in it, and the communal basis of peasant society made such widespread participation more probable. TeBrake refers the reader to F.S.L. Lyons who maintained that in those cases where boycotting was enacted against a member of the rural poor, any understanding of its potency as a weapon must take into account ‘the close ties of kinship and comradeship that held together their isolated rural communities. In such a context “social excommunication” was potentially a weapon of tremendous moral force.’

An alternative interpretation can be found in Charles Townshend’s Rebel violence in Ireland: a text that understands ‘proper’ political development to culminate in ‘proactive’ forms of activity dependent ‘on a grasp of political concepts (such as law and the state).’ In his evolutionary analysis of Irish resistance, Townshend argues that boycotting functioned primarily as a deterrent, encouraging a modification in behaviour in order to avoid punishment. Boycotting, therefore, worked similarly to how official law ideally should work. For Townshend, the fact that boycotting shared attributes in common with official law and generally involved less violence than earlier ‘inchoate forms of communal struggle’, signified ‘a modernization in the land struggle’ and, more importantly in terms of Townshend’s work, provided evidence that Ireland in general was in the process of evolving from a ‘pre-modern society where political awareness is limited’ to a more modern culture.

An examination of how boycotting worked and how it was responded to indicates, however, that it may not fit easily into either communal (suggestive of premodern), modern or even nonmodern categories. Boycotting was primarily dependent upon a network of rural dwellers at least some of whom lived under what might best be described as semi-feudal conditions, but it also required the co-operation of the commercial sector and was closely related to proceedings at the alternative law courts established by the Land League and the National League. The ambiguous nature of boycotting becomes apparent when taking into account the difficulties experienced by legislators attempting to categorize boycotting and determine how it might be punished as a crime. Under English law, as in all bourgeois legal systems, crime tends to be defined in terms of individual acts; boycotting was certainly not ‘modern’ in this sense. It was not the decision of the individual to refuse to have dealings with another individual that was at the root of boycotting’s damaging effectiveness, but the decision of the community as a whole. The individual act of boycotting, therefore, was of little significance and could hardly be categorized as a criminal offence.

This problem was noted by Justice James Stephen in ‘On the suppression of boycotting’. In this article, Stephen offered the following definition of boycotting:

the repetition of a number of what may be called disobliging acts, so concerted and repeated as to make life wretched, though individually they are of no importance, and are for the most part well within the rights of those by whom they are done.

For Stephen, one of the main difficulties encountered by those attempting to counteract boycotting was that a ‘modern’ society could only function if members of that society were at liberty, in a certain sense, to boycott each other, to cease to associate with people whom we do not for any reason like, to cease to do business with people with whom for any reason, good or bad, we prefer not to do business — in a word, to regulate all the course of our lives and of our intercourse with others according to our will and pleasure.

The individual farm labourer, for example, should be free to decide whose land he worked on, whose shop he bought produce from and who he sat beside at a church service. According to Stephen, to resent what you regard as harsh conduct in a landlord in evicting a tenant, or as meanness in a tenant who plays into his hand by taking the farm from which the tenant has been evicted, by refusing to have any dealings with either, may be wise or foolish [ ... ] if it is a mere individual act, the bona fide result of the natural feelings of the person who does it.

It was the communal dimension, the ‘transition from this to concerted actions’, that transformed a freedom Stephen believed to be the very essence of the contemporary economic system into a means of punishment as severe as any that could be passed in a British court of law.

59 TeBrake, ‘Irish peasant women in revolt’, 78. For a similar analysis, see Clark, Social origins of the Irish Land War.
To refuse to sell a man a loaf of bread is in itself nothing. In connection with other things, it may be a step in the execution of a sentence of death. To employ one lawyer or doctor rather than another, to send a parcel by one conveyance or another, are matters in themselves indifferent; but they may be steps in the infliction of professional or commercial ruin.

For members of Gladstone’s Liberal government, as for many members of the later Conservative government, boycotting presented a serious quandary. While recognizing that it was perfectly within the rights of the individual shopkeeper to determine who he did business with and spread withholding of services, it was the question of how to use a legal system whose basic unit was the individual labourer to punish acts that could only be described as criminal when communal. Under this act, a person was deemed to be guilty of an offence if he/she wrongfully and without legal authority uses intimidation, or incites any other person to use intimidation [...] to or towards any person or persons with a view to cause any person or persons, either to do any act which such person or persons has or have a legal right to abstain from doing, or to abstain from doing any act which such person or persons has or have a legal right to do.

Unable to discover a means to punish the communal act of boycotting, this abstruse piece of legislation bypassed the action or inaction of the boycotter and focused on a figure easier dealt with under the sanctions of English law: the individual who, through intimidation, instigated the boycott. It is not the person or persons who do the acts that they ‘have a legal right to abstain from doing’ or the person or persons who ‘abstain from doing any act which such person or persons has or have a legal right to do’ who faced criminal charges, but the person who ‘without legal authority’ intimidated the boycotter.

Attempting to trace boycotting to the words and actions of individual instigators was not always, however, to prove easy. Local leaders of the Land League and National League could enforce a boycott without risking prosecution by simply declaring a person ‘obnoxious’. Moreover, it would not have been necessary for anyone to openly advocate boycotting on occasions when ‘land-grabbing’ or other notable acts of transgression against the ‘unwritten law’ had taken place. In December 1880, the Freeman’s Journal cited the case of a Land League member who had rented land from which tenants had been evicted a number of years previously. While the Land League branch allowed the man to retain his membership of the League, he was, nonetheless ‘subjected to considerable annoyance’ when his cattle were driven off the land and he was refused goods by the local shopkeeper. Furthermore, while intimidation was undoubtedly a component of boycotting, especially in the case of those members of the rural community whose co-operation in the boycott could not be guaranteed, the means through which this intimidation was enacted was itself often communal or at least anonymous. A tenant-farmer who wished to rent land from which the previous tenant had been evicted would generally be prevented from doing so not through one straightforward act of intimidation by an individual instigator, but as a result of a number of related incidents. Such intimidation is best characterized by its multifinality. An anonymous letter, injury to livestock, burning of corn and hay stacks, a shot or brick through the window, or often simply the anticipation of a future boycott could result in the tenant-farmer abstaining from renting the land even if this was an act he was legally entitled to partake in. Under official law, the farmer could not be punished for his enforced co-operation in the boycott of the piece of land. Under what Michael Davitt and many others referred to as ‘the unwritten agrarian code’, his punishment for failing to uphold the boycott could potentially result in his death. According to William Forster’s biographer, T. Wemyss Reid, the chief secretary was to compare these two methods of monitoring behaviour in Ireland and find the British system lacking in efficiency:

all law rests on the power to punish its infraction. There being no such power in Ireland at the present time, I am forced to acknowledge that to a great extent the ordinary law is powerless; but the unwritten law is powerful because punishment is sure to follow its infraction.

While ‘nonmodern’ enough to prove difficult to punish under English law, boycotting was ‘modern’ enough to pose a substantial threat to the state and to give weight to the belief held by many within the Irish administration that an alternative system of government with its own means of administering law, albeit based on inverted values of right and wrong, was already in place in Ireland. James Stephen, in his article on boycotting, argued that participation in a boycott amounted to the usurpation of the functions of government and that boycotters should, therefore, be recognised in their true light as agents of subversion, as the modern representatives of the old conception of high treason.26 Societies were regulated, according to Stephen, by religious and secular sanctions, 'the one imposed by the church, the other by the state'. Of the secular political sanction, Stephen went on to claim, 'two assertions may be made: first that its existence is necessary, and, secondly, that its existence implies its being exclusive.' Following this logic, Stephen concluded that there could be but one government using the temporal political sanction in one nation, and, therefore, 'he law but Law'. By allowing their lives to be regulated, according to Stephen, by a secular sanction other than that controlled by the colonial administration system, boycotters, Stephen believed, had created a space for the establishment of 'secret and unrecognised governments' that 'try to displace the existing law and to establish a rival system of their own'.27

As the title, Ireland under the Land League, suggests, Clifford Lloyd's account of his experiences in Ireland pursues forward the proposition that land resistance and in particular the Land League had established a polity capable of replacing the colonial state and was in fact accepted by many as the legitimate political authority; the source rather than the breaker of law. Lloyd informed his readership that during the time he had worked as special resident magistrate in Ireland,

[Land League] committees were constituting themselves in every village of any size, and assuming to themselves many of the functions of lawful government, such as holding courts for the trial of cases connected with land, and disobedience to the general rules of the organisation, or non-compliance with its local edicts.28

Instead of lawfully 'petitioning the imperial parliament' and 'agitating' for the redress of grievances believed to exist, 'the Land League established laws of its own making, formed local committees for the government of districts, instituted into own local tribunals, passed its own judgements, executed its own sentences, and generally usurped the functions of the crown'. While anxious to draw attention to the illegitimate nature of this political authority, Lloyd was forced to recognize that in many parts of Ireland local Land League branches were not only a rival government, but the only effective government. Like many contemporary observers and political commentators based in Ireland, Lloyd distinguished between a de jure and a de facto government; an English administration that was the rightful, yet ineffective, government of Ireland and a rival authority that may not have right on its side, but was effectively in charge in many parts of the country.29 Aware when he was dispatched to Ireland that he was going to be assigned to some of the most 'disturbed' districts, Lloyd tells us that he was nonetheless shocked to find himself 'face to face with a state of affairs recognised to be bordering upon civil war, and much more difficult to deal with' in which 'the Land League Committee was able to rule by means not at the disposal of the Government'.30 Lloyd described the arrest of Land League members in Kilmallock and Kinfinane as an attempt to dethrone 'the hostile power in occupation'.31

In Lloyd's opinion, the Habeas Corpus Suspension Act, under which the 'hostile and upset government' was arrested, should never be used as a general means of containing crime: I regarded the act mainly as a powerful and summary means of displacing those who, in the name of a revolutionary body, had usurped power and were exercising authority pertaining to the queen's government alone.32 The regions he was operating in were characterized by defiance of the law, but he was keen to point out that this 'lawlessness' was not the result of 'ordinary' crime. Extraordinary powers were justified, Lloyd argued, because the situation in Ireland was itself extraordinary. Gladstone, who had resisted numerous calls to suspend habeas corpus during his first administration on the grounds that such an action could only be justified when the safety of the state rather than of individuals was threatened,33 shared Clifford Lloyd's belief that such a stringent measure was now a necessity. The Protection of Person and Property Act, which became law on 2 March 1881, provided for the detention without trial of 'any person declared by warrant of the Lord Lieutenant to be reasonably suspected of treasonable activity or, in a proclaimed district, of any person commits an act [tending to interfere with or disturb the maintenance of law and order]. A person arrested under the act could be detained 'during the continuance of this act [ .. ] without bail or mainprize'.34 Less grandly put, it allowed for internment without trial of suspected Land League activists.

While it would be difficult to find many grounds for comparison between Clifford Lloyd, the royal employee of the crown, and Anna Parnell, the Irish 76 Lloyd, Ireland under the Land League, 1879–1920, 88–9; 77 Lloyd, Ireland under the Land League, 88–9; 78 Lloyd, Ireland under the Land League, 88–9; 79 Protection of Person and Property (Ireland) Act (2 Mar. 1881), 44 & 45 Vict., c. 4. This act remained in force until 30 September 1883.

Republican, A. Parnell's _Tale of a great sham_ is based on a similar premise to that which informs _Ireland under the Land League_. A. Parnell's account of the period of the Land War, while critical of many of the policies pursued by the Land League, describes the establishment of the League as an important and novel episode in Irish history:

from that time till the present day there have always been two governments in Ireland, one English and the other Irish, in some sense a veritable Home government. The Home Rule League never attempted any of the functions of a government, but the Land League took on itself a good many of them at once, and all the nationalist societies or leagues that have followed since in an unbroken stream, have taken up the same position, more or less.

For Anna Parnell, the greatest achievement of the Land League movement was that it had enabled 'this small wretched country, so absolutely in the power of her bigger neighbour' to establish 'an independent government on voluntary revenue'. Daniel O'Connell's response to famine in the 1840s, Anna Parnell reminds us, had been an appeal to the British government for assistance, while the Land League, anticipating what many believed to be impending famine in the early 1880s, attempted to deal with the situation themselves. They were 'from that moment a government _de facto_'. In A. Parnell's interpretation of events, the Land League did not set out to establish an alternative government, but became _de facto_ administration in the process of dealing with an economic crisis. Anna Parnell's account of the Ladies' Land League during the period of the Land League suppression is for the most part a description of the mundane tasks of government. Collecting information on every region in the country, administering relief where necessary, supervising the building of houses for the evicted and suffering from one of the inconveniences all governments are supposed to be afflicted with, in being charged higher prices than anyone else', Anna Parnell found herself in the frustrating situation of providing a provisional government for an imprisoned Land League government she ultimately disapproved of.

During the 1880s, many commentators attributed the power and authority of local Land League and National League branches to the systematic and effective use of boycotting. In 1887, Montague Cookson, a Liberal candidate for Brixton, wrote to the _Times_ to highlight the importance of boycotting to the National League's _de facto_ administration of the southern regions of Ireland:

> It is too late to inquire whether home rule shall be established in Ireland. It is already there [...]. The strength of a government consists of its power to enforce its decrees. The decrees of the government of the queen are set at naught in the three counties I have mentioned [Cork, Limerick, Clare], while those of the League are instantly and implicitly obeyed. Its instruments of torture are always in order, and can be applied at any moment to coerce refractory spirits. The number of which is rapidly diminishing under the prevailing reign of terror. The 'boycott' is a far more ingenious and cruel invention than the thumb-screw.

In response to this perceived challenge to the colonial state, the Criminal Law and Procedure Act of 1887 revised the definition of conspiracy to include the acts of compelling or inducing any person or persons either not to fulfill his or their legal obligations, or not to let, hire, use or occupy any land, or not to deal with, work for, or hire any person or persons in the ordinary course of trade, business or occupation; or to interfere with the administration of the law.

Although this legislation demonstrated a greater knowledge of boycotting than was contained in the 1882 Crimes Act, it suffered from similar limitations. The treatment of those suspected of this crime was to be more severe than under the 1882 Act, but the offence for which they were tried was not boycotting, but intimidation to boycott. The alternative would have been to attempt to categorize, as James Stephen had suggested, a refusal to deal 'in the ordinary way of business as conspiracy'. As such a measure would be impossible to enforce, yet another British government, unable to legislate against a communal crime, chose to focus on the individual instigator.

In the aftermath of the Criminal Law and Procedure Act, Lord Randolph Churchill's earlier assertion that 'no law can deal with [boycotting] must have seemed more accurate than ever. While in general a substantial number of convictions were secured under the 1887 Act, it did little to stem this particular practice.

---

86 Anna Parnell was particularly critical of the strategy 'rest or the point of ~p weapon', which she claimed, subsidized landlords from the funds of the Land League. She argued that a general strike against all rent would have been a more effective form of resistance. See Parnell, _The tale of a great sham_, 77–87. 87 Ibid., 52. 88 Ibid., 4. 89 Cheap grain imports into England from Russia and North America, uneven rainfall and the reappar~ence of blight had led to an agricultural depression that left thousands of tenants-farmers in the south and west on the verge of starvation. 8A Parnell, _The tale of a great sham_, 52. 86 Ibid., 105.

---

aley-general was to point out that, even with the stringent measures contained in the Criminal Law and Procedure Act, boycotting was effectively paralyzing the judicial process in many parts of the country. The authorities were to find that they were almost powerless to prevent the boycotting of shopkeepers, landlords and ‘landgrabbers’. Indeed, the police were unable to protect even themselves from boycotting. In 1886, a year before the act was passed, a special store was opened in Co. Galway to supply boycotted police with goods from Dublin. The Criminal Law and Procedure Act did little to rectify this situation. In 1888, the British government was forced to seek the help of what James Stephen categorized in his article on boycotting as ‘religious sanctions’, asking the Vatican to intervene in the situation. The Holy See responded with a ‘rescript’ condemning boycotting as illegal and forbidding Catholic clergy from partaking in the practice. Notwithstanding this papal command, Matthias Bodkin, an Irish judge sympathetic to the nationalist cause, could refer to the police drafted into Dundalk in 1889 for the trial of the Irish members of parliament, J.R. Cox and T.P. Gill, as ‘invading troops in a hostiled country, rigidly boycotted by all the inhabitants of the town’. While the police are unable to obtain the most basic provisions, the “criminals” were honoured guests, feted and cheered by the entire population [...] and invited to lunch with the mayor. In order to procure a carriage to convey the defendants from the courthouse to the railway station, the local constabulary inspector was forced to interrupt this lunch to enquire whether one of the defendants, T.P. Gill, could have the police boycott lifted. Bodkin makes it clear in his description of these events that the state’s attempt to explain the boycotters’ actions or inaction by reference to intimidation by a small body of troublemakers was seriously flawed. Not without a touch of irony, Bodkin reminds his readership that it was those who had refused to rent transport to the police whom the police had been called upon ‘to protect from intimidation’.

Applying the concept of individual crime to the communal act of boycotting was not the only difficulty involving the law that confronted successive Liberal and Conservative governments. A local Land League leader who, for example, openly advocated the boycotting of a landlord could, under both the 1882 and 1887 Acts, be charged as the instigator of a boycott against this landlord, but was unlikely to be found guilty under ‘ordinary’ law. As frustrated politicians and colonial commentators noted, an Irish populace that had the option of taking their own legal cases to the League courts were reluctant participants in the official court system. Slow to come forward as witnesses and unlikely to pass a guilty verdict when on a jury, the vast majority of the Irish people tended to disregard British institutions of law and order in favour of an alternative discipline. The Liberal chief secretary, William Forster, wrote to Gladstone of the difficulties involved in the ‘arrest and detention of men on suspicion when the whole population sympathises with a man who commits an outrage, knows that hardly any witness will give evidence against him and that a jury in his own district will certainly acquit him’. The Liberal lord lieutenant, Lord Cowper, pointed out that for the ordinary law to be sufficient to repress crime it is necessary that the majority of the population should be on the side of the injured person. What Forster and Cowper failed to recognize was that even those members of a rural community who disapproved of both the man and the ‘outrage’ might be reluctant to co-operate with an official investigation: The refusal of the majority of the Irish populace to participate in British law proceedings was to demonstrate the extent to which the successful administration of ‘ordinary law’ requires the co-operation of the people.

The introduction of extraordinary measures to counteract this non-cooperation was acknowledged, particularly by Forster and Gladstone, as a sign of failure. The Liberal government had come to power determined to ‘try the experiment of governing the country under the ordinary law’, and this ‘experiment’ had been abandoned. ‘Ordinary’ law was simply incapable of dealing effectively with Irish ‘disorder’ as for the most part it did not command the consent of the people. The Prevention of Crime Act, 1882, a draconian piece of legislation that — as L.P. Curtis Jun has stated — amounted to the imposition of ‘martial law’, allowed for a series of repressive measures specifically designed to compensate for the refusal of so many in Ireland to comply with official legal institutions. Often depicted as a direct outcome of the Phoenix Park murders, these measures — which included the establishment of courts consisting either of three judges or hand-picked jurors, and the holding of trials outside the defendant’s county of residence — had been debated for some time before the Liberal chief secretary, Lord Frederick Cavendish, and his under-secretary, T.H. Burke, were stabbed to death by the Inimicibles: The attempt 96 Forster to Gladstone, 14 October 1880, Gladstone papers, BL Add. MSS 44773, fol. 577-78. 97 Minute by the for the subject, 12 November 1880, cited in O’Callaghan, British high politics and a nationalist Ireland, 96. 98 See Reid, Life of Forster, vol. 2, 90. Ibid. 99 The Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act, 1879, embodying many of the exceptional repressive powers open to the Irish government, had been due to expire shortly after the liberal government came to power in mid-1880. Rather than renew the expiring repressive legislation, the new Liberal government decided to bring in a limited remedial measure as a temporary response. 100 Curtis, Cowper and the Inimicibles, 19. For example, Clifford Lloyd and W. O’Connor Morris’s evidence before the Lords Committee on Irish jury laws in 1881. An Editorial editorial appeared in the Freeman’s Journal on 1 November 1881 cites Morris, a county court judge in Kerry, as having told the committee that ‘the jury System reflects [...] the opinion of the country, and you might as well expect a jury of Sistine 700 years ago to convict a fellow-Saint for murdering a Norman noble;

CHAPTER TWO

‘Writing law(lessness)’: legal crisis and narrative structure in Emily Lawless’s Hurrish

Emily Lawless’s Hurrish is one of a number of novels written in the 1880s that take as its focus the legal conflict I discussed in the first chapter of this book. At the time of its publication in 1886, Lawless’s narrative attracted considerable attention and its portrayal of Irish peasant life during the Land War period became a topic of some debate. In a letter to the editor of the Freeman’s Journal in March 1886, the Ascendancy historian W.E.H. Lecky argued that Hurrish, although a very new book, should be included in a recently-compiled list of the best hundred Irish books. Dr G.F. Shaw, a lecturer in law at Trinity College, concurred with Lecky, pointing out in his letter to the editor that while Lawless’s ‘Irish dialect is not very accurate’, her ‘character-drawing is full of truth and charm’ and that her young heroine is as new in fiction as it is true. I believe, in the actual womanhood of Ireland. At a time when verisimilitude and in particular the ability to accurately capture the peasant on page, was in Ireland one of the main criteria employed when judging the worth of a literary work, any critique of Lawless’s novel would be forced to counteract such claims of truthful representation. Consequently, Father Matthew Russell, editor of the Irish Monthly, was in a later letter to accuse Lecky and Shaw of promoting a book which contained a very unamiable, not to say atrocious, picture of an Irish peasant mother as true to life as the caricature of Irish dialect, which Dr Shaw confessed, “is not very accurate”. The debate over the representational qualities of Lawless’s writings was still in evidence some ten years after the publication of Hurrish. In an article on contemporary prose writers that appeared in the Bookman in 1895, W.B. Yeats accused Lawless of magnifying a peasant type which exists here and there in Ireland, and mainly in the extreme west, into a type of the whole nation, while in 'Novels of Irish life in the nine-

1 Other examples include: Letitia Clancarty’s A hoarded hand-knoll, Frances Robinson’s The House of Campagne and Anthony Trollope’s The Law-Bouquet. 2 I am extremely grateful to Margaret Kelly for drawing my attention to this debate. 3 Lecky’s letter was reprinted in “Provisional” (Richard Barry O’Meara) (ed.), The best hundred Irish books no. 4, “Presocratics” (ed.), The best hundred Irish books no. 3. See Katherine Short’s more nuanced critique of Hurrish as ‘bellatrix’, but as a picture of Irish life (‘... bitter and one-sided’) Irish authors and poets, II, 25. 6 Yeats, ‘Irish national literature, II: contemporary prose writers – Mr O’Gaidh, Miss Lawless, Miss Biddle, Miss Hopper, and the folk-lorists’, The Bookman (August 1895), reprinted in Yeats, Collected prose, vol. 1, 359.
As James Cahalan has pointed out, by the publication of a number of valuable critical studies in recent years, the reading of Lawless’s Land War novel contained some critical neglect, while important in itself, is most useful when accompanied by an investigation of the ways in which these recovered works of fiction enable us to challenge notions dominant in literary criticism.

The absence of novels by women in Foster’s study of novels of the revival period is particularly noteworthy since, as a number of scholars have made clear in more recent publications, the late nineteenth century was an extremely fertile period for Irish women writers. Anne Colman and James H. Murphy, in particular, have provided valuable overviews of the work of these neglected writers, demonstrating that in the late nineteenth-century Ireland, women from both Protestant and Catholic backgrounds played a role in literature as writers, critics, and anthologists that their successors were subsequently to lose in the early twentieth century.

Perhaps of most importance to my reading of Harrish however, is Margaret Keller’s suggestion in her analysis of women writers of Land War fiction that this recovery process, while important in itself, is most useful when accompanied by an investigation of the ways in which these recovered works of fiction enable us to challenge notions dominant in literary criticism.

7 Cited in Wolfe. William Carleton, Irish peasant novels. 118. Thomas Flanagan draws the reader’s attention to this quote when denying the continuation of the tradition encapsulated in the title of his critical study, Flanagan, The Irish novel, 1800–1875, 412. 77 Murphy, “Things which seem to you enigmatical.” 78 See also Colman. “Far from silent: nineteenth-century Irish women writers.” For a selection of women’s writing from this period, see M. Keller’s section: Women’s fiction, 849–900. 79 A. Bourke et al. (eds.), The Irish Day anthology of Irish writing, vol. 3. 80 Keller, “Late nineteenth-century women’s fiction and the land ‘agitation’.” biases that have shaped Irish literary studies, is not intended as a simple act of recovery: an attempt to restore to the canon of Irish literature a neglected gem. My interest in Hurris is located primarily in the way that the novel compels us to rethink theoretical models and premises developed in the study of the metropolitan novel and question an uncritical application of such models and premises to Irish literature. Hurris offers up for the reader’s inspection three conflicting systems of control: ‘unwritten law’, official law and feudal ties. The novel demonstrates the extent to which these conflicting systems of control are competing value systems that define the norms of the novel’s Burren community in vastly different ways. In Lawless’s Land War narrative each of these conflicting systems and their corresponding value-systems are explored and ultimately condemned. In the pages that follow, I will examine, with reference to the work of such influential figures as Georg Lukács, Franco Moretti and Nancy Armstrong, the implications of this narrative process, demonstrating the extent to which an analysis of Hurris can reveal the limitations of Anglo- or Eurocentric theories of the novel when applied to Irish fiction of the nineteenth century.

Hurris is notable for its detailed account of agrarian violence. Set in the Burren district of Co. Clare during the time of the Land War, Lawless’s narrative centres on two violent deaths. The first of these deaths is that of the brutal Mat Brady, who is killed by the hero of the text, Horatio O’Brien, also known as Hurris. Following a trial that fails to convict him, Hurris is murdered by Mat’s more urbane stepbrother Maurice. In this novel, it is the two characters with the least propensity for violence that are responsible for the violent deaths we witness. Hurris has a ‘good-tempered soul’, but can be ‘roused to fury in a moment’, while Maurice Brady, a rationalist who aspires to middle-class respectability and rejects secret societies in favour of mainstream nationalism, is found ‘skulking’ in the dark, intent on avenging his brother’s death. It could be argued that Lawless’s narrative, by focusing on the violent actions of these particular men, is propagating the notion that the personal passions of an instinctually-violent people are inevitably at the root of agrarian crimes in Ireland. The depiction of the Irish populace as irredeemably linked to violent activity and the particularization of acts of violence were methods commonly employed to avoid acknowledging the alternative modes of organization within which agrarian ‘outrages’ found their rationale. In Hurris, however, two main categories of rural violence are juxtaposed: the penalties inflicted on those who break the ‘unwritten law’ and the violent acts that take place outside the sanctions of both unofficial and official law. The narrative invites the reader to distinguish further within this latter category between the brutal savagery of Mat Brady, Hurris O’Brien’s sudden loss of control and Maurice Brady’s premeditated act of vengeance. These two sets of distinctions, combined with the exclusion of the atavistic Mat Brady from local agrarian societies, ensure that Lawless’s narrative is never reduced to a Manichean conflict between state law and anarchic crime.

Mat Brady, the perpetrator of the first violent act we encounter in Hurris—the attack on Sal Connor—is the character in Lawless’s narrative who most closely resembles the simianized Irish produced by the English press:

After her in full pursuit followed a man—unreadily, red-faced, heavy-jawed, brutal—a sort of human orang-outang or Caliban, whose lumbering action and coarse gesture had something grotesque and even repulsive about them, as it were a parody or perversion of humanity. Mat’s callous treatment of animals, in particular his brutal assault on Hurris’s sheep, would also have been familiar to contemporary readers of English newspapers. At that time, the press, when characterizing Irish agrarian ‘outrages’ as the irrational acts of a barbarous people, often drew the reader’s attention to the injuring and killing of animals. In Lawless’s narrative, Hurris echoes a sentiment common to newspaper coverage of the Land War period when he voices his disquiet at the practice of ‘disfiguring dumb bastards, too, that never did no one any harm’. This concern for ‘dumb bastards’ links Hurris to the narrator who tells us that ‘the cries of tortured animals—not less audible, perhaps, for being inarticulate—had again and again risen for vengeance to the sky’. Mat’s savage attack on Hurris’s livestock could, therefore, be interpreted in the context of a very specific critique of Irish agrarian agitation. The dead sheep with the ‘hideous gash across its innocent white throat’ is an image that the Times would have happily included in its descriptions of Irish agrarian violence. As is pointed out on a number of occasions in Lawless’s narrative, however, Mat’s actions do not have the sanction of either ‘unwritten law’ or the societies that punish those who transgress it. His ‘ill-temper and brutish misanthropy’, we are told, ‘kept him from sharing the predominant sentiments and dangerous councils of his neighbours’, thereby ensuring that he was not a member of any secret society. Moreover, Mat is not only precluded from involvement in agrarian societies, he is suspected of ‘having been more than once tampered with by the enemy’. Mat Brady, easily the most violent character in this novel, is believed by his neighbours to have connections to the official legal system.

19 Ibid., 9. For an analysis of this simulacrum process, see Curtis, Apu and angels. 20 Lawless, Hurris, 29. 21 Ibid., 159, 20, 60.
Mat's individualistic behaviour further alienates him from the community-based agrarian code. In this novel, it is Mat who takes over an evicted holding and, in doing so, commits one of the most significant violations of the agrarian code. In the opening chapter of Lawless's narrative, the reader is told that Hurrish, whose land lies adjacent to this holding, 'had no more idea of taking the farm from which the Maloney's had just been evicted than he had of taking Dublin Castle'. The Maloney farm may, as Sal Connor observes, be 'mightily convenient' for Hurrish, but he will not be swayed by financial self-interest to pursue a course of action so obviously in breach of the agrarian code. Mat, by contrast, is openly defiant of the unwritten laws and conventions that govern the behaviour of those around him. His decision to break the agrarian code and rent the Maloney farm is not financially motivated; the farm, which also lies adjacent to his land, 'would be a loss rather than a gain to him'. For Mat, its worth lies predominantly in the opportunities which a possessor of it would enjoy for harming and generally annoying [Hurrish].

Hurrish and Mat differ, therefore, in their approach to the agrarian code, but, as is made painstakingly clear to the reader, they are equally willing to act in direct contravention of market forces and their own financial self-interest. Hurrish's reluctance to even contemplate taking land that would make his farm more viable stems from his awareness of communal norms, while Mat's aggressively-individualistic desire to destroy Hurrish could leave him destitute.

Mat, predisposed to anarchic violence and individualised behaviour, is contrasted to both Hurrish and the unwritten agrarian code, but it is primarily through Hurrish that Lawless's narrative critiques and ultimately rejects this code. As his two names suggest, Horatio or Hurrish occupies an ambivalent position in his community. Christened Horatio, and known less commonly as Hurrish, he is 'the resident' magistrate, the reader is informed, is somewhat paradoxical since he is 'the only one of the magistrates not a permanent resident' (Lawless's emphasis). Indeed, the most compelling and comprehensive condemnation of 'unwritten law' in this novel is voiced by the normally-reticent Hurrish when he discovers that an unpopular process-server, a man even more detested than Mat, has been stoned to death:

I'm not sayin' he oughtn't to ha' been stopped [...]. Don't mistake me, Phil. But shite — they're nasty cruel things shite is! The blood runs cold through my body when I think of that cur at all by himself — tinned for the bare life, an' beggin' an' prayin' ov him to let him off, and they throwin' the stones at him an' laughin'! [...] Och, Phil! man alive, taint that way the country's to be righted, howesomever! What, killin' a man here and killin' a man there, and frightenin' a lot of poor foolish colleens, wid rushin' in to the houses in the dead of the night, cuttin' off their hair, an' makin' them aware — the divil a bit they know what!26

In this passage, Hurrish delivers a damning critique of agrarian justice yet avoids challenging the logic this system of control draws upon to distinguish between right and wrong. Foregrounding Hurrish's conflicted response to the agrarian code allows for its depiction as a established value system, but ultimately facilitates a thoroughgoing condemnation of this code; as a popular member of the community with an innate understanding of communal norms, Hurrish's assertion that 'taint that way the country's to be righted, howsomever' carries far more weight than a similar assertion by a character who adheres to a very different set of values.

Through its title character, Lawless's narrative provides a damning critique of 'unwritten law', but Hurrish is equally critical of 'unwritten laws' official counterpart. In this novel, those who administer official law are at best harmlessly ineffectual and at worst dangerously incompetent. The disparaging tone employed when referring to Peter O'Flannagan and Andy Holohan, members of a local secret society, seems mild when compared to the contemptuous treatment of Mr Higgins and Mr Cavanagh, local representatives of official law. Mr Cavanagh's title of 'resident' magistrate, the reader is informed, is somewhat paradoxical since he is 'the only one of the magistrates not a permanent resident' (Lawless's empha-

---

21 Ibid., 62. 24 Ibid., 7.
He and sub-inspector Higgins, "stiff and thick-set, stolid English official, is stamped upon every line of his heavy-featured, commonplace face", are just two examples of the 'professional dullards' whose most noteworthy characteristic is their ignorance of Ireland and the country's inhabitants.31

The first public display of official authority that the reader encounters in the novel, the coroner's inquest that takes place in the valley where Mac's body lies, is a theatrical event reminiscent of a farce. The valley and its surroundings is a theatre brimming over with eager spectators and the crowds who have gathered on the ledges and rocks overlooking the inquest are not disappointed with the entertainment on offer:

"... on one side the dozen unwilling ministers of the law - whole-coated or ragged-coated, as the case might be; on the other the coroner, a stout little man in a suit of rusty black, with a pock-marked, dim-complexioned face, imperceptible nose, and air of vulgar importance."32

One of the original dozen plucked from the crowd, Thady-na-Taggarc, the 'village idiot', adds to the spectacle by 'tucking to his heels, and starting across the rocks at the pace which the official who had secured him did not see his way toimitating'. In the light of the novel's negative portrayal of official law, the reader could hardly be surprised to learn from the narrator that 'the "society" has in Ireland long since come to occupy in popular imagination the place of a despised and derided executive'.33

The only three characters in the novel with whom the reader is encouraged to identify - Hurrish, Alley and Major O'Brien - deliberately defy official law. Shortly before his death, Hurrish, who had previously failed to report his involvement in the death of Mac Brady, lies to the police when they question him about his own shooting. His reluctance to betray Maurice Brady to the authorities is in marked contrast to Maurice's earlier decision to supply Hurrish's name to sub-inspector Higgins. In the logic of the narrative, Maurice's cooperation with official law is an indication of his selfish disregard for those who love him, while Hurrish's refusal to co-operate with official law is further proof of his forgiving and 'tender-hearted' nature.

Alley, whose 'innate truthfulness' ensures that she could never lie in response to a direct question, withholds information from the police that she knows would lead to Hurrish's conviction and tries to convince Maurice Brady of the damaging implications of pursuing this matter through the courts. Alley's emotive plea to Maurice to think of Hurrish's 'poor little children [...] without a dada to put bread in their mouths' was designed, perhaps, to have a greater effect on the novel's readership than on Maurice Brady. The reader who, like Alley, knows that 'Hurrish is not a bad man, whatever he may do when the temper's on him' is led to conclude that to imprison Hurrish or hang him, thereby leaving his children destitute, would be in excess of justice.34

The first meeting that takes place in the narrative proper between Major Pierce O'Brien and sub-inspector Higgins finds O'Brien, the local landlord, refusing to accept the police escort that has been assigned to him and reminding Higgins of his 'very limited experience' of Irish matters. At their next meeting, Higgins asks O'Brien, a magistrate, to sign a warrant for Hurrish's arrest. O'Brien, deeply concerned for Hurrish and exasperated with Higgins's 'indifferent officialism', denies this request. Higgins's evaluation of O'Brien's refusal as 'rather a grosser violation of law, if anything, than the murder itself' merely works to further demonstrate his 'insistent officialism'.35 The reader empathizes with O'Brien's antipathy for the unappealing Higgins and enjoys in his act of defiance. Consequently, it is not only characters in the novel who enjoy seeing official law flouted; narrative devices, in particular the portrayal of character, ensure that the reader shares in this enjoyment.

Notwithstanding the positive depiction of Major O'Brien as a character in Lawless's narrative, it is made clear that the form of authority he represents is archaic and ultimately obsolete. When Major O'Brien's nephew, Thomond O'Brien, learns that Hurrish has been accused of murder, he invokes this feudal authority, questioning the government's right to intervene in matters concerning tenants on his uncle's estate: 'The Government! What business, I should like to know, has the Government to interfere with our people!' (Lawless's emphasis)36 The reader knows, however, that Major O'Brien's earlier attempt to challenge this right by defying Higgins and refusing to sign the warrant only delayed Hurrish's arrest by a few days and had no long-term consequences. Following this act of defiance, Major O'Brien, who had grown used to the tenants on his estate greeting him with 'black looks, averted eyes, and all the hundred and one petty proofs of invertebrate dislike', finds that 'brows clear, hats are doffed, and faces beam with delight at his approach'. In a more conventional account of landlord/tenant relations, such gestures of good will would function to demonstrate feudal ties. In Lawless's narrative, they work to further indicate the absence of these ties. 'Hats are doffed', it is made clear, not as an expression of respect for Major O'Brien's position as landlord, but in direct response to his defiance of an equally unpopular form of authority, the official legal system. As a landlord, Major O'Brien, we are told, had done 'everything he could think of for the welfare and advantage of [the] people, and had been rewarded with suspicion, hatred, and ill-will. By setting himself up in momentary opposition to the established powers, he suddenly, and at a bound, sprang from the blackest depths of unpopularity to the very summit of popular admiration.6

Major O'Brien, who is all too aware of the origins of this change in attitude, is greatly disinclined to his nephew's flawed understanding of landlord/tenant relations. Repeated references to an ancestor who shared the same name suggest that Thomond O'Brien has been born in the wrong era.7 Thomond, who lives abroad and misguidedly believes Donore and its surroundings to be 'all still the "kingdom" of the O'Brien's', traces the roots of the present discontent to his uncle's laxity in his dealings with his "people".8 When he learns, for example, that poachers have significantly depleted trout numbers in the lake, he advises his uncle to 'give [the poachers] a right good hiding', to which Major O'Brien replies that 'they are very much more likely to give me a hiding'. Major O'Brien's affectionate mockery of his young nephew is echoed by the narrator who describes Thomond as 'a survival, a forgotten fragment, a small leaf from the fallen tree of the past who possesses a cargo of ideas of a truly distressingly antiquated description'. Central to this cargo of 'defunct ideas', the reader is told, is the notion that 'an O'Brien should be the father and protector of his people, and that in return should yield him a loyalty which stopped short at nothing, even death.9 It is through the character of Thomond O'Brien, therefore, that Lawless's narrative contrasts the antagonisms that exist between landlord and tenant at the time the novel is set with an earlier golden age of landlord/tenant relations that can never be revived.10 Moreover, the fact that it is a member of the younger generation of the O'Brien family who is hopelessly attached to the values of an historical period long over suggests that the landlord class is incapable of producing any new form of authority.

In the final chapters of the novel, 'normal' landlord/tenant relations are resumed in that the fleeting popularity Major O'Brien had won by defying Mr Higgins has been replaced by the open hostility to which he is more accustomed. In the closing pages of Lawless's narrative, however, this 'hostile' tenantry seem unusually eager to co-operate with sub-inspector Higgins and his associates. At first, it would appear as if: a particularly odious crime, Maurice

5 See, for example, ibid., 179, 182. 5 etc. 179, 182. 6 This contrast is common to texts written by members of the Anglo-Irish Ascendancy during the nineteenth century. In texts written in the latter half of the century, present ascendants find their origins in the famine. The narrator in Hurrishe, for example, reminisces about the period prior to the famine when the O'Brien were 'adored' (196). In texts written in the period prior to the famine, however, this golden age is also relegated to the past. Writing in 1841, for example, Sir John Barrington looks back with nostalgia to the eighteenth century when 'a kind Irish landlord enjoyed respect in the widest affections of his tenants, their pride and pleasure being to support and obey him': Barrington, Trental dehors of his own time, vol. 1, 5–6.

Brady's shooting of the ever-popular Hurrishe, has shocked the local populace into reviewing their relationship with the representatives of the official legal system; Andy Holohan, 'reputed assistant in at least half-a-dozen violent outrages', voluntarily goes to the police to tell them of Maurice Brady's involvement in Hurrishe's shooting.11 When we are informed, however, that 'all the powers of that underground government [...] were brought to bear upon the matter,' it becomes clear that collaboration with the official legal system in this particular instance does not represent a rejection of alternative forms of control. It is a mere temporary alliance of benefit to both parties that will have no long-term repercussions. Consequently, Andy Holohan comparing notes with a policeman on a low tone of sympathy and confidential intercourse is mockingly referred to as a 'beautiful sight, calculated to make any one believe in the speedy oncoming of a universal millennium'.12

Hurtiss offers a narrative in which three conflicting forms of control are held up for examination and found lacking. In the concluding episodes of the novel, Hurrishe and Maurice absolve each other of their crimes. This gesture towards closure does not, however, allow for narrative resolution, as the exchange between Hurrishe and Maurice takes place within the confines of Hurrishe's cabin and is incapable of filling the legal void that exists outside these walls; ultimately, this personal encounter functions as a further indication of the lack of faith that these men have in the societal structures that are supposed to administer justice. The final paragraph of the novel expresses the hope that by the time Hurrishe's two sons are men, 'Ireland will have entered upon a new departure'. In the context of the story just recounted, however, the narrator's ability to imagine this alternative future is severely curtailed: 'What precise form that departure will take, and whence its brightest hopes are to come, is a little difficult, it must be owned, just now to discern.'13

It is the legal void at the centre of Lawless's narrative and the corresponding rejection of each of the value systems depicted in the novel which ensures that Hurrishe does not perform one of the fundamental functions of realistic fiction, as defined by a number of influential theorists of the novel. For Georg Lukács in The theory of the novel and Franco Moretti in The way of the world, the realistic novel is a bourgeois literary form that portrays and promotes the socialization of the individual.44 In democratic-bourgeois societies, Moretti tells us, the social order must appear to be 'symbolically legitimate' (Moretti's emphasis).45 In other words, it is not enough for the social order to be the dominant one in narrow political terms: it must align itself with what are perceived to be the values of society as a whole. For the social order to be legitimate in the sense that Moretti uses this term, affiliation with it must be interpreted as a value choice and not a necessity. Socialization can only be considered a success, therefore, if “as a free individual”, not as a fearful subject but as a convinced citizen, one perceives the social norms as one’s own (Moretti’s emphasis). The realist novel, according to Moretti, both represented and contributed to this process.

In _Anomalous states_, David Lloyd agrees that one of the most important features of the realist novel is its capacity to make normative the passage of the individual from singularity to social integration by repeatedly telling the tale of the ‘anomalous individual learning’ to be reconciled with society and its projects. This individual narrative of self-formation, he goes on to argue, ‘is itself subsumed in the larger narrative of the civilizing process, the passage from savagery to civility’.

As my reading of Lawless’s novel indicates, however, Hurish does not provide the reader with one set of values that would allow for an unambiguous mapping of this passage. The conflicting systems of control held up for the reader’s inspection are also competing value systems that define the social norms of the novel’s Burren community in very different ways. As the ‘passage from savagery to civility’ is a trajectory that requires a fixed starting and finishing point, a novel that initially provides the reader with multiple interpretations of where these points might be and then proceeds to reject all of these interpretations will undermine rather than reinforce the bourgeois socialization process theorized by Moretti.

It is through an exploration of the central female characters in Hurrish that the implications of this rejection can be most fully explored. As Nancy Armstrong points out in her feminist-Foucauldian analysis of domestic fictions, the production of modern ethical subjects by the novel is intricately linked to its production of gender; with the ideal woman of bourgeois imagination functioning as a ‘bearer of moral norms and socializer of men’.

In the typical scenario, the reader will witness the central female character — Pamela, Elizabeth Bennett, Jane Eyre — coax the central male character — Mr B., Darcy, Rochester — into accepting the superiority of the value system she represents. The socialization process narrated in the realist novel is, consequently, also a process of domestication that can only be fully completed through the arena of the household.

In Lawless’s narrative, it is Hurish’s mother, Bridget, who provides over the ‘utterly inconceivable squalor’ that is the O’Brien household. Bridget O’Brien not only lacks the virtues that the domestic woman, as represented in the English fictions analyzed by Armstrong, should have, she possesses attributes that are a direct parody of these virtues. She is a ‘domestic despot’, who controls all aspects of life within the cabin, and does so through violence and intimidation. She decorates the interior of the cabin, but the prints with which she chooses to cover the walls are of a singularly bloodthirsty nature. ‘There was one cheerful design in particular, representing the roasting alive of men in swallow-tail coats, tall hats, and white neck-cloths, presumably landlords and their myrmidons.’ She performs a nurturing role, but the qualities she attempts to instil in her son are antithetical to the qualities that the reader of domestic fictions is encouraged to admire. Indeed, the trajectory that Bridget urges Hurish to follow is in direct contravention to the ‘passage from savagery to civility’ that is the socialization process. Hurish’s abhorrence of violence is for Bridget a character defect. His failure to become actively involved in the administration of ‘unwritten law’ is interpreted by Bridget as a humiliating consequence of that defect which reflects badly on her: ‘That I should have a son — a grown man — the strongest and biggest man in the country, — and him never strikin’ a blow wid the rist!’ Consequently, upon finding Hurish’s blackthorn stick in the bushes near Mat Brady’s corpse, she reproaches in an ‘achievement’ that has redeemed her reputation as mother: ‘Glory be to God and the saints this day! Me shame’s wiped out!’

As anyone who has encountered the first Mrs Rochester in Charlotte Bronte’s _Jane Eyre_ can testify, however, monstrous women are not unique to the Irish novel. In Desire and domestic fiction, Nancy Armstrong — pointing out the presence of such women in writings by the Brontës, Elizabeth Gaskell, Charles Dickens and William Makepeace Thackeray — argues that the origin of this figure is to be located in anxieties over conflicts between competing social formations.

In Lawless’s narrative, explicit links are formed between bridget and the alternative mode of organization that is the agrarian code. Hurish, we are told, ‘had an awe, not unmixed with secret dislike, for that “unwritten law” under which he [...] lay bound and fettered; he had also a long-standing use of his mother, and the two points showed a good deal of electrical affinity."

Yet in (from indicating the appropriateness of Armstrong's model to the Irish novel, the explicit connections that are formed in Hurrish between the monstrous Bridger O'Brien and the agrarian code actually works to demonstrate this model's limitations when applied to Irish fiction. Noting the tendency within Victorian culture to 'render all collective forms of social organization as sexual violation', Armstrong argues that domestic fictions displaced conflict between social formations by 'turning' combination into a female who lacked femininity. Contained within the body of the deranged or monstrous woman, all threats of social disruption suddenly lose their political meaning and are just as suddenly quelled.9 No such process of displacement occurs in Lawless's Hurrish, a narrative that tells of social disruption and a monstrous female.

In the fiction Armstrong discusses, a monstrous woman like Bridget is generally counterpointed to a domestic female whose happy marriage will bring the narrative to a satisfactory conclusion. Alley Sheehan is the only character in Lawless's novel to resemble the domestic female of English fiction. Alley, we are told, has a 'tem for deadliness' and shares with the narrator a desire to organize into separate categories the 'odds and ends of all sorts, domestic, agricultural, piscatorial' that have accumulated in the O'Brien cabin.10 Bridger stringently opposes Alley's attempts to organize the household and it is only on those rare occasions when Bridger is absent that Alley can fully indulge her domestic inclinations. Bridge's trip to Donologue market, for example, finds Alley vigorously sweeping the floor while contemplating putting the 'odds and ends' that clutter the cabin into 'receptacles of their own'. Alley's attempt to transform the cabin she shares with Hurrish and his family into a domestic haven suggests that it is her 'feminizing' influence that will facilitate the domestication process in this novel. It is clearly demonstrated, however, that Alley's efforts to counterfeit this domestic chaos will have no long-term consequences. The 'state of revolution' that is the result of Alley's housekeeping is only a temporary condition. As Alley tidies the cabin, a breeze lifts the dust that she has just swept out the door and brings it back inside where it settles 'into a thick grey drift in one of the corners'.

Alley's failed attempt to impose order on the O'Brien household is only one aspect of a more general failure of the domestication process in this novel. The role assigned to women like Alley in the English fiction discussed by Armstrong is to domesticate recalcitrant social forces. In a narrative that is equally condemning of official law and its unofficial counterpart, Alley's role is less clear. She can still exert a 'feminizing' influence, but the reader is unsure as to the ideal end result of this influence. In the concluding chapters of the novel, Alley, who experiences 'a sickening paralyzing chill' when she finds Hurrish's blackthorn stick in the vicinity of Mac Brady's corpse, defends Hurrish from both the law and her fiancé, Maurice. She is simultaneously appalled by Hurrish's actions, but cannot function as a 'bearer of moral norms' as she is equally appalled by the competing structures that define and defend 'moral norms' in this society. Consequently, she will try to protect Hurrish from all attempts to punish him for actions she abhors. Furthermore, this wavering loyalty to Hurrish is one of the insurmountable obstacles that preclude the possibility of a union between Alley and Maurice ending the feud between the O'Brien and the Brady households; an event that would have brought a fleeting stability to Lawless's Burren community.

By the end of the novel, the two central female characters have been removed from both the narrative and the community it describes. As commonly occurs in English domestic fictions, the monstrous female is purged from the text: 'Bridget suddenly fell back, the iron ladle still menacingly clutched in her hand, was taken up rigid and never spoke again.' It is made clear that there is no place in the concluding passages of Lawless's narrative for this 'petticoated vamp'. As previously stated, however, the monstrous woman in Hurrish does not function to displace conflict between competing social formations. Consequently, in contrast to the novels Nancy Armstrong writes about, Bridget's expulsion does not quell threats of social disruption. Furthermore, the world of Hurrish, unlike the societies described in English domestic fictions, is no place for the monstrous woman's domestic counterpart. Alley Sheehan, 'too tremulous for a world so full of harsh surprises', seeks refuge in a convent where her, as yet, unappreciated domestic tendencies ensure that she finds 'repose in the fulfillment of a small and very simply routine of well-defined daily duties'. Lawless's domestic woman is to be a bride after all, but the union she embarks on will isolate her from a community in which she can play no role.

An analysis of Hurrish reveals the dangers of an uncritical application of theoretical models and premises developed in the study of the metropolitan novel to Irish literature. As the Irish postcolonial critic Joe Cleary has pointed out, in the colonial setting the modern novel emerges as a compromise between a metropolitan form and local materials. Contrast the conditions of the metropolitan and colonial novel does not necessarily entail reinforcing an overly simplistic dichotomy between a stable England and an unstable Ireland. Cleary reminds us, with reference to the writings of David Lloyd, that nineteenth-century Ireland was as violently transformed by the development of modern capitalism as nineteenth-century Ireland, though these transformations took very different forms. Since the novel was the chosen literary form of the sectors in society who were registering those transformations most articulately, social stability, as both Cleary and Lloyd point out, could hardly be described as a precondition of the novel. As an alternative to a flawed critical model which establishes the realist novel as a literary form that can only flourish in a stable society and, consequently, was doomed to failure in nineteenth-century Ireland, Cleary suggests that instead we think of the realist novel as a genre whose structural form and social functions were intrinsically interconnected to metropolitan conditions quite different to the conditions that produced the Irish novel of the nineteenth century.

9 Lawless, Hurrish, 58. 10 Armstrong, Death and domestic fiction, 89. 11 Lawless, Hurrish, 91. 12 ibid., 31. 13 ibid., 51, 52.

One of the most useful contrasts that can be formed between the conditions that produced the nineteenth-century English novel and the conditions that produced the nineteenth-century Irish novel is the contrast between a society in which an ideology of justice had become the primary means through which class power was legitimated and a society in which the official legal system was both too coercive and too partisan to serve any such legitimizing function. In The way of the world, Franco Moretti draws our attention to E. P. Thompson's analysis of the rise of the Rule of Law in England and, in particular, to the following passage in Whigs and hunters:

Over and above its plant, instrumental functions, [eighteenth-century law] existed in its own right, as ideology, as an ideology which not only served, in most respects, but also legitimized class power. The hegemony of the eighteenth-century gentry and aristocracy was expressed, above all, not in military force, not in the mystifications of priesthood or of the press, not even in economic coercion, but in the rituals of the study of the Justices of the peace, in the quarter-sessions, in the pomp of the Assizes and in the theatre of Tyburn.

Reminding us that a social order can only appear symbolically legitimate if it aligns itself with 'values held to be fundamental', Moretti asserts — with reference to the Thompson passage cited above — that in eighteenth- and nineteenth-century England it was around the idea and practice of law that such values converged. The official legal system was, therefore, intricately linked to what was perceived to be the value-system of English society as a whole. This value-system was in turn the main means of monitoring the passage from savagery to civility which, as David Lloyd claims, was the basis of the socialization process narrated in the realist novel.

E. P. Thompson's thesis, as previously pointed out, is of interest in the Irish context primarily because of what its inapplicability to an analysis of the workings of law in Ireland (both official and unofficial) can reveal. The rise of the Rule of Law charted by Thompson and the subsequent subordination of other forms of control are inevitable outcomes in a society where official law functions to legitimate class power. As law can only serve this ideological function if it has the appearance of measured impartiality, an official legal system that oscillates between coercive acts and at times blatantly discriminates against the majority of the population will impede as opposed to reinforce the legitimization process referred to by Thompson. As stated in Whigs and hunters, 'if the law is evidently partial and unjust, then it will mask nothing, legitimize nothing, contribute nothing to any class's hegemony.'

Hardin tells of an official legal system that has failed to align itself with dominant values and in the popular imagination remains the 'landlords' law'. It tells of the subsequent antagonistic relationship between this legal system and alternative forms of control. It is not only for the representational qualities that so intrigued its earliest commentators, however, that Emily Lawless's Land War fiction deserves once again to be the focus of critical attention, but because the novel as a whole is representative of a phenomenon that shaped the nineteenth-century Irish novel: a disjunction between a literary form that was the abstract of metropolitan social relations and local materials that emerged from quite a different set of social relations. Hardin narrates the absence of the very conditions upon which the socializing ends of its literary form was reliant.
CHAPTER THREE

‘Ride rough-shod’: evictions, sheriffs’ sales and the anti-hunting agitation

Shortly after coming to power in April 1880, William Gladstone, who was later to praise Emily Lawless’s Harriet as a novel that depicted "not as an abstract proposition, but as a living reality, the estrangement of the people of Ireland from the law," appointed a royal commission under the Irish landlord, Lord Bessborough, to examine the workings and failures of property law in Ireland. This commission was given the task of exploring issues relating to Irish land, and in particular, to the workings of the 1870 Land Act. Forming connections between land agitation and land tenure, the commission traced the problems of Irish land to the misapplication of English property law to Ireland, a country where, the report stated, the relationship between landlords, tenant-farmers and land was substantially different to the relationship recognized by this property law:

That law may have been beneficial in its operation in a country where it was merely the embodiment of existing relations or the expression of prevailing tendencies; but when transplanted into a country where the relations between landlord and tenant were of a different character [...] not only did it fail to change those relations into the likeness of English traditions, but also, by its attitude of continual antagonism to the prevailing sentiment, it became detestable to tenants, and helped to bring the courts that administered it, and the government that enforced it, into undeserved odium. In the result, a conflict of rights, legal and traditional, has existed in Ireland for centuries.1

The report sought to clarify what the main function of property law ideally should be: the purpose of such law was not to force change, but to provide 'legal recognition to the existing state of things'. In Ireland, the commissioners’ research had led them to conclude, this was patently not the case and, conse-

1 Gladstone, Special report of the Irish question, pp. 2-3. Gladstone’s first land act, the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1869, recognized in law a limited version of custom right customary where it existed in the province of Ulster or in cases of like practice elsewhere in Ireland. 2 Report of the inquiry’s commissioners of inquiry into the working of the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1880, and the act conferring the same (Bessborough Commission). 3

Evidences, sheriffs’ sales and the anti-hunting agitation

quently, ‘a chasm exists [...] between the law and the facts, which has to be filled up somehow’. The commissioners concluded that there were only two possible solutions to this dilemma: either the realities of society as we find them, which have existed for centuries, must at last be severed from their foundations, or the law must be altered.4 Choosing to endorse the second of these options, the commissioners urged parliament to legislate for the actual relationship between landlord, tenant-farmer and land in Ireland.

Reading the Bessborough Commission’s report, it becomes apparent that one of the main obstacles encountered by those seeking to restore faith in the official system of law in Ireland was their own lack of confidence in the appropriateness of the laws they were supposed to endorse. It was not only Irish nationalist leaders who argued that official law could amount to a system of ‘legal injustice’;5 barristers sympathetic to the nationalist cause who wrote of the ‘landlords’ law’,6 and popular ballads that proclaimed the sentiments, if it’s legally so, ‘as not justice, I know’.7 Many members of Gladstone’s Irish government and even some members of the later Tory government were to share the nationalist belief that in Ireland popular dissatisfaction towards the law was not without some justification.

In his discussion of the serving of processes in Carraroe in 1880, Richard Hawkins describes how mass evictions and particularly the events that took place on the Kirwan estate in the month of June were to convince many in the Irish administration of the injustice of property law in Ireland.8 Members of this administration, arguing that they had no choice but to enforce the law and recognize a landlord’s right to evict, reluctantly assisted with evictions on over seven hundred people who, according to their local government board inspector, were on the point of starvation and simply unable to pay their rent:

As to the condition of the people they are at all times an exceedingly poor community and the circumstances which have combined to impoverish the whole of the west have rendered them doubly poor [...] A few of them have some little money, and some who have boats avail themselves of an occasional fine day to replenish their store from their long lines. These are the means at present, and charity is interposing to make them suffice till the crop is down.9

4 Ibid., pp. 20-21, 25. 5 Davitt, The fall of landlordism in Ireland, 1867-1880. The devil’s work in the Clare county, p. 5. 6 Davitt, The fall of landlordism in Ireland, 1867-1880. The devil’s work in the Clare county, p. 5. 7 H. Hawkins, Liberals, land and coercion in the summer of 1880. The land war was accompanied by a sharp increase in evictions. In 1879, 1600 people were evicted from their farms. By 1880, this figure had risen to 16,916. 8 Henry Robinson, 22 March 1880, NAD, CSO, 1/1880/1880; cited in Hawkins, ‘Liberals, land and coercion in the summer of 1880’, p. 49.
With reference to the situation at Carraroe, William Forster addressed the parliament on what he alleged to be one of the main difficulties encountered when administering law in Ireland:

We feel bound to carry out the law, and enforce these evictions with any exercise of force however severely they may press upon this distressed people. So long as I remain where I am, and that law exists, it will be my hard duty to enforce it, because nothing can work so much harm in Ireland as to allow the law to be disobeyed or disregarded. At any exercise of force we must enforce the law. And mark what I say — let the house realise our responsibility, in order that they may realise its own. We must enforce the law, even at the cost of life. On the other hand, we find a feeling of injustice [...] We want to be in the position that when we send down 100 or 200 men to protect a process-server [...] or ejectment, that it should be an ejectment which should be justifiable not merely in a court of law, but in a tribunal of justice.

In her journal, Florence Arnold-Forster, the adopted daughter of William Forster, wrote of communication that passed between her father and the Lord Lieutenant, Lord COWper, in which both described their reluctance to 'use the full legal and military [force] of the executive in helping landlords to clear their estates by evicting the peasants under the present circumstances of unavoidable distress and poverty.' William Forster argued on a number of occasions that, in order to be enforceable, property law in Ireland would have to be altered. The Compensation for Disturbance Act which he hoped would make property law more just was, however, rejected by the House of Lords in the August following the Carraroe evictions.

Representatives of the Conservative government with responsibility for Irish affairs were likewise unsure whether law could always be said to equate with justice for the tenant-farmers of Ireland. Major General Sir Rodvers Buller, 'pacifier of the African bush', was appointed under the Salisbury administration to restore law and order in the south-west of the country in August 1886. As pointed out by Margaret O’Callaghan,

Buller, a professional soldier with colonial experience, [...] was [supposed] to provide an antidote to the ambiguity that was seen to have characterized Liberal policy towards law and order in the period leading up to the introduction of the Home Rule bill in 1886.

After spending just three months in Ireland, however, Buller wrote to the Tory chief secretary, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, to outline what he believed to be one of the principle sources of rural discontent:

The fact is the bulk of the landlords do nothing for their tenants but extract as much rent as they can by every means in their power, and the law helps them; and the tenant, even if an industrious, hardworking man, has no defence [...] What chance has a tenant under the present law?

In an earlier letter to Hicks-Beach, Buller referred to a certain landlord Colonel O’Callaghan — who is what is here described as very obnoxious to his tenantry, and who is certainly in respect to them a hard, overbearing man.' Buller, informing Hicks-Beach that ‘most of the tenants cannot really pay, sought advice as to whether evictions on O’Callaghan’s property should be assisted. Hoping to reduce the number of evictions taking place in the southwest, Buller proposed a scheme whereby landlords intent on eviction would be compelled to complete an official form stating the time, place and reason for the proceedings. If inquiries should lead Buller to conclude that the proposed eviction was unjust, he could refuse to provide a protection force for the sheriff and his evicting party. The attorney general, Sir Richard Webster, was one of a number of Conservatives to vigorously oppose this initiative on the grounds that it denied Irish landlords full recourse to the law.

Alfred Turner, who was appointed divisional magistrate under the Conservative government, later participated in evictions on Colonial O’Callaghan’s Bodyke estate in Co. Clare. In an interview with a Press Association journalist at the time of the evictions, Turner stated that ‘these are the most unjust evictions I ever saw, and you may tell it from me,’ while in his memoirs he recalled that ‘the proceedings were in the highest degree distressing to us all, but it was our duty to enable the sheriff to carry out his work.’ According to Virginia Crossman, there were a number of resignations from the police force in Turner’s district in the spring of that year. John Dillon, reminding Balfour of this embarrassing situation, sought clarification in parliament... as to whether the reason given by seven of those who had resigned was not that the proposed coercion act of the government would render the position of the Irish constabulary intolerable, and that they must decline to be the instruments of carrying out any further evictions which they know to be unjust.\(^5\)

Nevertheless, impetus for the transformations in the land system that took place in Ireland in the 1860s should be traced neither to the 'altruism' of the colonial government nor even to moving speeches by the nationalist leadership, but to the tenant-farmers themselves and their relationship to the land they worked. When Charles Stewart Parnell announced at a meeting in Westport that the tenant-farmers of Ireland should 'hold a firm grip' of their 'homesteads and lands', he was accused by both English conservative newspapers and mainstream Irish nationalist newspapers of implanting dangerous ideas into the minds of the Irish rural poor.\(^6\) A journalist from the Times asked C.S. Parnell whether, in the context of his Westport speech, he would be surprised if ignorant rustics carried away the impression that in his view it was right to snap their fingers at the law and the rights of property, and to treat the holdings which they farm as their own,\(^7\) while an editorial in the Freeman's Journal reminded nationalist leaders that 'the law gives the landlord the right to his rent or to the land'.\(^8\) As both of these newspapers interpreted changes in the Irish political climate in terms of elite stimulus and subaltern response, they failed to recognize that C.S. Parnell was not necessarily dictating that his audience develop a radically new attitude to the holdings they farmed, but perhaps merely acknowledging that an attitude which already existed could become a crucial component of Irish agrarian agitation.

George Campbell, a Scottish employee of the English government in India, wrote about Irish land tenure over ten years before C.S. Parnell's speech and was one of a number of commentators at that time to describe the actualities of land relations in Ireland as anomalous from the perspective of English property law: 'It is hardly possible to approach the subject without first realizing this - viz., that in Ireland a landlord is not a landlord, and a tenant is not a tenant - in the English sense.' In England, according to Campbell, the term 'tenant' is understood to refer to 'a man holding under a commercial character. In Ireland, the man whom we call a tenant is something for which we have no even a word.' In Scotland and England, Campbell pointed out, it was expected that the landlord would reclaim waste land, put up fences, build out-houses, etc., while in Ireland, as in India, it was generally the tenant-farmer who was responsible for any improvement to property.\(^9\) Campbell was not alone in arguing that these contrasting practices were symptomatic of very different property relations. Frederick Waymouth Gibbs, an English barrister who shared Campbell's conviction that Irish land tenure was 'at variance with the spirit of English law', likewise drew attention to the Irish custom whereby 'as a rule the permanent improvements are [...] made almost wholly by tenants'.\(^10\) The later Bessborough Commission was to point to one of the practical difficulties that resulted from this discrepancy between law and practice:

In Ireland it has been the general rule for tenants to do more, at all events, than the mere agricultural operations necessary to insure them such a profit as could be realized within the time which constituted the legal terms of their tenancies.\(^11\)

Campbell, acknowledging that it might seem 'absurd to English ears that a man who has come in under a definite contract of a mercantile character [...] should claim any right to hold beyond the terms of his contract', informed his readers that in Ireland contracts are invariably at conflict with custom.\(^12\) While contracts between tenant-farmers and landlords asserted absolute rights of property as vested in the landlord, all classes in Ireland, not just the Irish tenant-farmer, described the tenant as 'owning a farm', 'selling his farm', 'having bought a farm', 'having inherited a farm'.\(^13\) After questioning tenant-farmers and landlords in nearly every region of Ireland, Campbell was to state that 'it is well known that the tenants habitually dispose of their farms by formal will, charge them with fortunes for daughters, and in every respect deal with them as property.'\(^14\) In Ireland, even those who are 'not inclined to assert tenants' rights of property against those of the landlords [are found to be] constantly, and as it were unconsciously, applying the language of property to the tenure of farms'.\(^15\) For Campbell, putting 'out of sight the customary law of the country' and asserting that 'the theoretical English law is the only law' had resulted in the following situation: 'in theory the landlords are absolute owners; but in fact are they so? Most assuredly not.' Under these circumstances, 'it is a mere superstition to talk as if it would be a sacrilege to acknowledge some sort of claim to a property which is already so fixed in the hearts and language of the people of Ireland, law and high. Recognising 'the occupants as in some sense co-proprietors of the soil', according to Campbell, would 'only be giving the people by law what in practice they already have'.

---

Forming a similar conclusion to the later Bessborough Commission, Campbell argued that 'the whole difficulty arises from our applying English ideas and English laws to a country where they are opposed to facts and [...]. The customs of the people'. The tensions that Campbell claimed to be a direct result of 'clashing of these two systems' were, he stated, particularly pronounced in times of eviction. Under English law, landlords were entitled to evict and could seek the help of the police in order to do so. Reminding his readers that 'the law administered by the ordinary tribunals' was not the only law in Ireland, Campbell asserted that 'it is an abominable state of things when any wrong-headed man might throw a country into a rebellion by ignoring rights which the law has strangely ignored.' An example of this type of wrong-headed man, for Campbell, was a landlord who 'cries to take possession of the land as his own, or to give it to whom he chooses'. As under the law that the colonial authorities had mistakenly dismissed as 'nothing but “lewd customs”', no such right to evict existed, this man would be at once met by a law stronger than the law. Campbell concluded from his research that the tenantry who attempted to prevent evictions taking place interpreted their actions not in the context of breaking the law, but in terms of protecting what they believed to be their legitimate right to the land.

Reflecting upon the issues raised in George Campbell's The Irish land encourages us to engage with a question that has long been a source of heated debate within Irish historiography: What were the concepts of property that Campbell believed had been unsuccessfully erased by English law in Ireland? The translation, transcription and publication of the Brehon law tracts in the latter half of the nineteenth century brought a new impetus to this debate, functioning as a source of reference for both those who sought to prove that prior to the conquest of the country the Irish had no concept of absolute property ownership and those who were keen to dismiss such claims as a primitivist fallacy. The historian, A.G. Richey, introduced the fourth volume of the Ancient laws and institutes of Ireland by arguing that for the 'Irish tribes' the 'legal unit is not the individual but the household; the head of the house acquires property for [37] Richey (ed.), Evictions, sheriffs' sales and the anti-hunting agitation.

his household, and possesses it as the manager of an implied partnership, not as an absolute owner'. In a later passage, however, Richey referred to a Brehon law tract, 'Divisions of land', which he claimed was sufficient to put an end, once and for ever, to an assertion, which seems to have become an axiom adopted by all authors on Irish history and antiquities, and which has also gained considerable political notoriety, namely, that the ancient Irish had not attained to the idea of exclusive ownership in land, and that all the land, until the influence of English law prevailed, was considered the joint property of the tribe and family.

For James Connolly, common ownership of land or a 'primitive communism' that in other countries had failed to acquire a higher status than that conferred by the social sanction of unlettered and uneducated tribes, had in Ireland formed part of the well-defined social organisations of a nation of scholars and students, recognised by Chief and Tanist, Brehon and Bard, as the inspiring principle of their collective life, and the basis of their national system of jurisprudence.

In contrast, the historian and activist, Eoin MacNeill, was critical of those who he claimed had 'come to Irish law as a happy hunting ground for primitive big game' expecting to find 'evidence of a primitive custom of tribal communism', but instead discovering that 'the ancient Irish jurists, all of them, seem to have a bias towards private as distinguished from collective property.' MacNeill's disparaging remarks were directed at the well-known sociologist, Sir Henry Maine, whose writings on the Brehon laws in the early history of institutions was in his opinion indicative of such an approach. Notwithstanding MacNeill's claims to the contrary, Maine's research into the Brehon laws did not lead him to reject the significance of communal property ownership to early Irish society and focus on these aspects of the Brehon laws that seemed most in tune with the concept of private ownership. Acknowledging that many Irish commentators 'resent the assertion that the land belonged to the tribe in common as practically impeding to the ancient Irish that utter barbarism to which private property is unknown', Maine put forward a nuanced analysis in which the Brehon law tracts point to the existence of a form of private ownership, but not to absolute property rights:

---

It is perfectly true that the form of private ownership in land which grew out of the appropriations of portions of the tribal domain to individual households of tribesmen is plainly recognized by the Beothun lawyers; yet the rights of private owners are limited by the controlling rights of a brotherhood of kinmen, and the control is in some respects even more stringent than that exercised over separate property by an Indian village-community. 48

Those working on the ground in early modern Ireland also commented on landholding practices at that time. In the early seventeenth century, English land surveyors were to discover that Gaelic landholding was an extremely complex system with significant regional variations. What these surveyors soon found out, however, was that any attempt to assess 'ownership' of land, as defined under English Common Law, would invariably run into difficulties. 49 Gaelic landholding may have differed from region to region, but certain characteristics were common throughout the country, the most notable of which was the absence of a concept of absolute ownership of land. Even the overlords, who landholding methods may have differed from region to region, but certain characteristics were common throughout the country, the most notable of which was the absence of a concept of absolute ownership of land. Even the overlords, who occupied the highest rung of this landholding system, did not 'own' land. Certain lands were attached to his office, but, as Michael Glancy, a more recent commentator, points out, these demesne lands were technically the property of the entire sept as opposed to the property of the individual lord. 41 In early Irish society, where absolute ownership of land was rare, occupancy was a matter of some importance. Even the unfree gained a right of inheritance after thirty years uninterrupted occupation.

It is questionable whether Irish tenant-farmers in the mid to late nineteenth-century fully adhered, as George Campbell proposed, to the concepts and practices of Gaelic landholding. Nonetheless, the most common modes of resistance exercised against sheriffs, process-servers and bailiffs suggest that while the Irish tenantry believed they had a right to the land they occupied, this sense of 'ownership' was by no means individualistic. When S.J. McMeakin, the agent's manager for the Kirwan estate in Co. Wexford, requested the constable at Garrace RIC barracks for an escort of four men to enforce the serving of processes, the constable informed him that he would not leave the barracks for the purpose with 100 men, and that at least 200 must be brought there. 42 The constable warned McMeakin that even with that number of police, there is a village on Garrace North called Derryjaggery where no ejectment will be served without shooting down a passage through the mob. 43 As this constable would have been aware, it was common practice for large numbers of men, women and children to gather to prevent the serving and enforcing of processes on holdings whose occupants they may never have met. The church bells or horns that warned of the approach of process-servers and eviction parties could assemble a considerable crowd in a matter of minutes. The policemen and soldiers who were given the task of protecting those serving and enforcing processes were often compelled to retreat when faced with such assemblages.

Other methods employed to prevent or delay evictions required the labor of a large portion of the local community. The practices of fortifying houses and blocking the passage of process-servers and bailiffs by placing boulders, trees or other more unusual objects in their path point to a collective resistance to evictions. In 1881, when a county sub-sheriff travelled to New Pallas to visit a landlord in the process of evicting a tenant, he found his passage 'obstructed at intervals by heaps of stones'. The final impediment that he encountered consisted of a number of dead cats, which depended from a line drawn across the road, either end being fastened to a tree. This, although apparently the most harmless obstruction, was near being the most serious, as the cats having come in contact with the horse's head, the animal became restive, and was with difficulty restrained from taking flight. 44

In 1886, evictions on Lord Clanricarde's estate in Co. Galway were hampered by an operation which, L.P. Curtis Jnr tells us, 'in design and execution resembled a medieval siege'. 45 Enforcing evictions on this estate cost the authorities £300 and required the assistance of two resident magistrates, more than five hundred RIC men, and a number of bailiffs and emergency men. In August 1888, the property of a tenant threatened with eviction at Coolroe, Co. Wexford, was transformed into a high-security fortress. A number of trees were felled and placed on the road of approach, earthworks twenty feet high were thrown up around the man's house, protecting it from demolition and the battering ram. A deep trench was dug between the earthworks and the house making entry to the house extremely difficult, as did the iron bars that were fastened to the windows with chains. The siege finally ended when a local parish priest intervened to prevent the inspector in charge opening fire. 46 Orchestrated action of the kind that formed the no-rent manifesto and the later Plan of Campaign was successful, therefore, not simply because of the popularity of the nationalist leadership, but because the concept of co-operative resistance threatened property and land was already deeply ingrained in Irish rural life.

In Elementary aspects of peasant insurgency in colonial India, the subalternist historian Ranajit Guha notes that conspiracy theories tend to figure prominently in official interpretations of Indian peasant uprisings. The conspirators are in most of these cases suspected to be members of one or the other rural elite group on the simple assumption that the peasant has no initiative of his own and is a mere instrument of his master. This tendency is also evident in the writings of officials based in Ireland in the late nineteenth century. In Ireland under the Land League, for example, Clifford Lloyd attempted to blame ‘disorders’ in rural Ireland on Land League leaders whose speeches, he claimed, were the source of the present discontent and whose tyranny had terrorized the people into submission. Lloyd’s text concludes with the following dramatic assertion: ‘blood the Land League wanted, and blood it caused to flow, with a cruelty and savageness unsurpassed in history’. What Lloyd tried to indicate through such statements was both the externality of the agents of ‘disorder’ and the natural passivity of the peasantry. As is the case in the writings Guha discusses, the suggestion is that the poorer rural dwellers have lost ‘their innocence thanks to the irruption of outsiders’ and would be ‘blessfully reconciled to landlord rule’ if left alone. When engaged in reading Lloyd’s account of his work in Ireland, however, it becomes clear that the relationship between Land League branches and agitating tenant-farmers and labourers was far more complex, variable and ambiguous than his closing statement suggests. While Lloyd, in a number of passages, attributed ‘lawlessness’ to the secret design of a small number of instigators, his description of individual events reveals the extent to which agrarian agitation was shaped by the poorest members of the rural population. On Lord Granard’s estate in Co. Longford, for example, process-servers, ‘protected by large bodies of police and the Royal Dragoons’, were forced to turn back when they encountered the people ‘assembled in their thousands’ armed with pitchforks and staves. An even more frustrating series of events outlined by Lloyd occurred when he was on his way to rescue an agent’s son who he believed to be in danger and found his way blocked by three walls, each bigger than the previous one, which had been built in the middle of the road. Forced to dismantle the walls to allow passage to police and army vehicles, Lloyd found on his return that the walls had been rebuilt and had to be dismantled once more.

In his account in The fall of feudalism in Ireland of the particular events he witnessed during his trip to Carraroe in 1880, Michael Davitt made it clear to the reader that what he referred to as the ‘battle of Carraroe’ was a popular-based agitation in which he played little part. Davitt noted that ‘it required no outside influence […] to route a village or a town-land in opposition to evictions. The process-server’s arrival in Carraroe, Davitt tells us, was ‘looked for by sentinels on hill-tops and other places of observation, and, when his police escort would be seen approaching, horns would be sounded or other signals be given which would summon all within hearing to repair to the scene of the process-server’s work’. News of attempts to serve processes at Carraroe was ‘sent to all the neighbouring islands and inland to Rosmuck and the western part of the Joyce country for aid’. By the following morning, Davitt tells us, ‘the mountaineers […] succeeded in bringing in reinforcements from all the islands off the coast as well as from the interior of the mountains, mustering altogether some two thousand men in front of the constabulary barracks’. In his description of these events, Davitt refers to himself as an ‘intruder’ who ‘women and children, in their bawbeens and red petticoats […] greet […] by kindly glance or scowling looks, according to the impression which my appearance created’.

Davitt, carrying a notebook in which he kept a record of his impressions, observed the road had been dug across some six feet of its width, with the evident intention of cutting off communication between Spiddal, the Royal Irish Constabulary base, and Carraroe (my emphasis). He was ‘more than delighted to observe by this that the mountaineers had some practical ideas of warfare’ (my emphasis). He observed, a quarter of a mile farther on, that a huge rock had been rolled down from the precipice upon the road passing at its base and speculated that the purpose behind this action must be to give annoyance to the perhaps ‘convoys’ (my emphasis). The relationship between Davitt, one of the most prominent leaders of the Land League, and the inhabitants of this Connemara district is depicted in The fall of feudalism in Ireland as that of interested spectator and active participants.

The contrast between collective resistance, as practised by the rural poor, and what was generally perceived to be the more isolated nature of the landlords’ response was a cause of considerable concern for colonial commentators and members of successive Irish governments. In the context of the impediments, often quite literal, that he encountered in even the most mundane aspects of his work, Clifford Lloyd drew attention to the landlords’ unwillingness in the early 1880s to form counter-combinations in response to the all-too-successful combinations of the rural poor: ‘there is no cohesion on the part of the landlords, nor among other people whose conscience, loyalty, or interests prompted them to resist the self-created authority set up in their midst’.

52 Davitt, The fall of feudalism in Ireland, 219. 53 Ibid., 215, 213, 212, 210, 207-10, 206, 54 Lloyd, Ireland under the Land ten years later, the Conservative chief secretary, A.J. Balfour, was to complain about the Irish landlords who 'always cry out before they are hurt when the government is concerned' - but when the National League is concerned, they tell their hands and do nothing. Angered by a landlord in Co. Galway who had surrendered to the Plan of Campaign and those who had failed to provide this landlord with adequate financial and moral support, Balfour wrote to his uncle that '[i]t is utterly useless to try and help the Irish landlords by trilling grants from the Treasury - when they show themselves so utterly incapable of the simplest combination to be destroyed piecemeal in this fashion.'

Recalling his impressions of 'landlord and English interest' in Cos. Kerry and Clare during the autumn of 1886, Alfred Milner was likewise highly critical of the individualist nature of the landlords' response to the Plan:

'It is very hard to combine Irish landlords at all, [even harder] to combine the self-centred and ignominious squires of a backward county like Kerry. They have no notions of organisation, and are only too apt to think it safest, as of course it is easiest, to make the best terms they can for themselves, and let their neighbours sink or swim as they may.'

The Plan of Campaign, though limited to a relatively small number of estates, was, as Virginia Crossman has pointed out, 'subject to intense media scrutiny and came to be seen as a trial of strength between tenants, supported by the National League, and landlords, supported by the government.' The problem for the government was that while there were a number of well-known incidences when landlords had refused to lend or give money to fellow landlords made insolvent by the Plan, it was generally acknowledged that the League had little difficulty in organizing tenants and in ensuring that they were supported by the wider community.

Notwithstanding accusations of disunity directed against the landlord class by Lloyd, Balfour, Milner and others, there were a number of organizations established by landlords during the 1880s the sole purpose of which was to provide support for Irish landlords and their associates. The services offered by the Anti-boycotting Association, the Anti-Plan of Campaign Association, the Land Corporation, the Irish Defence Union, the Irish Land Committee, the Orange Emergency Committee, county defence unions, and the Property

Defence Association included providing Protestant labourers from the north of the country for boycotted landlords, supplying bailiffs to assist sheriffs, providing armed men to protect farms from which tenants had been evicted, protecting 'landgrabbers' from intimidation, and sending representatives to bid for farms or stock being sold for rent due.

In a letter to the Freeman's Journal in January 1882, Earl Fitzwilliam, a founder member of the Property Defence Association, outlined what this latter service entailed:

in the case of dishonest tenants who refuse to pay rent and whose cattle and farms are put up for sale by legal process, the Property Defence Association comes forward to bid and ensure a bona fide sale, which, without that aid, cannot take place, as the Land League prohibits anyone from purchasing in these cases.90

Refusal to pay rent could result in a civil bill process, signed by the landlord, being served on the tenant-farmer requiring him/her to appear before the county court judge. If the county court judge found in favour of the landlord, he would direct the sheriff to execute the civil bill decree to obtain the debt owed. Under this decree, the sheriff was entitled to seize goods belonging to the tenant­ farmer and auction them to the highest bidder. As Fitzwilliam's letter indicates, however, sheriff's sales in the early 1880s were to take on a significance beyond that of the stock offered up for sale. In February 1881, Charles Stewart Parnell congratulated the 'people' for their refusal 'to bid for stock offered for sale in cases of disfranchised for unjust rent', adding that only in a very few instances can the organisation of the landlords and focus of the Government be sufficient to enable an oppressive landlord to collect his rent by these means.91 To guarantee that landlords did receive the money due to them in rent, an organization consisting primarily of landlords bid for and often bought property and stock it probably had no specific use for. The main purpose of this exercise, Fitzwilliam's letter makes clear, was to ensure that a sale was seen to have taken place and, consequently, to provide visual proof that Irish landlords were capable of countering the combinations that worked against them.

Reports that appeared in the Freeman's Journal and the Leinster Leader towards the end of 1881 and beginning of 1882 confirm Charles Stewart Parnell's and Earl Fitzwilliam's depictions of sheriff's sales as a primary focus of rural tensions.92

90 'The defence of property in Ireland', Freeman's Journal (1 Jan. 1882).
91 Freeman's Journal (2 March 1881).
92 See 'Sheriff's sale atNano', Leinster Leader (29 Sept. 1881); 'Abortive sheriff's sale at Dalkey', Freeman's Journal (9 Dec.)
journal on 8 December 1881, is representative of the kind of coverage such events received. When stock (animals, carts, hay, etc.) belonging to Mortimer Doyle, a tenant-farmer who owed his landlord rent, was put up for auction, the only bidder was Mr Hanna of the Property Defence Association who purchased two cows. The cows were then driven to Bray by Property Defence men who, we are told, required the protection of about a dozen policemen. In descriptions of sheriff's sales at Keady and on Lord Mayo's estate, the Freeman's Journal clarified why a substantial police presence might have been deemed necessary on such occasions. In Keady, 'there was a large crowd present, who groaned the agent and Emergency men', while on Lord Mayo's estate there was a large assembly of people, and their numbers were momentarily increased by the ringing of chapel bells in the district and the blowing of horns. In the latter case, where the haycocks put up for auction were 'decorated with pictures taken from the Weekly Freeman of Davitt, Parnell, and Dillon, a tenant's wife opened a bag of feathers and [...] thickly coated the uniform of the police.

An article that appeared in the Leinster Leader in September 1881, focused on events that occurred in conjunction with a sheriff's sale at Naas:

Half Kilkullen and that side of the country turned out to show their sympathy with the tenants; and as the long cavalcade, preceded by the fifes and drum band, playing national airs, defiled into the town, the spectacle was at once suggestive and impressive.

The account given in the Freeman's Journal of Captain L'Estrange's response to the bands that arrived in Edenderry for a sheriff's sale suggests that these defiant-festive gatherings had become all too familiar to some officials:

[Captain L'Estrange] next turned to the head-constable, and told him if any band appeared on the scene to break every instrument they would have. At the time, no band was present, but just as the sale was over the Rhode Fife and Drum Band was heard approaching [...] [Captain L'Estrange] marched a party of police rapidly up, took their large drum, and had it brought into barrack. It was subsequently restored, with the top and bottom cut through in several places. When Mr Wyer's cattle were set free they were marched up the street, and the Edenderry Brass Band suddenly turned out and played them round the market square, just as they had completed its circuit they saw the captain and a large body of police rapidly approaching, and fled into shelter.

When a tenant-farmer bought back his fifteen cattle that had been taken for rent due, Captain L'Estrange, who was in charge of troops brought to Edenderry to oversee this sale, accused him of being 'one of a band of rogues who would not honestly pay their rent, but was taking up his whole time hunting for their pigs and cattle to seize on and make them pay'.

As Captain L'Estrange's comments suggest, preparations for sheriff's sales could be just as frustrating for the authorities as the sales themselves. Hunting and herding cattle and pigs were not the activities that this army man believed should fill his working day. Sheriff's sales could not take place, however, until the sheriff had physical possession of the goods to be sold and this stock was not always easily obtained. The soldiers who set out to confiscate vehicles to transport crops and animals to a sheriff's sale near Edenderry found that 'some hundreds of men spent the night cutting down immense trees, tearing up the roads, and breaking down bridges, so that immense labour had to be expended before they reached the farm'. Moreover, upon reaching a farm, it might be discovered that the stock had already been removed. In November 1881, the Leinster Leader reported on the case of a member of the Clonmore branch of the Land League, Mr James Carty, who had refused to pay his rent. After receiving information that his stock was to be confiscated and sold, three thousand men and women, many of whom had to be turned away, are said to have gathered to save Mr Carty's potatoes and turnips. Following the work in the fields, the ceremonial aspect of the proceedings took place. The men and women 'marched off in procession order to Clonmore, a distance of two miles. The horses and cars headed the process-

sion, the drivers standing erect with their glistening steel forks on their shoulders. Demonstrating his awareness of the symbolic importance of such occasions, the reporter tells us that the 'men on foot marched four deep, shoul­dering their forks, shovels, and spades, as if they were weapons of defence, which in one sense they were."

Captain L'Estrange was not the only official who was critical of the nature of the tasks that the British army was expected to perform in the early 1880s when based in Ireland. The employment of British army units in providing escorts for sheriffs, process-servers, bailiffs, seized cattle, etc. was a cause of considerable concern for military authorities and the War Office. The breakdown of civil power in Ireland and subsequent involvement of the army in police work was interpreted by many as a violation of the legal status of the soldier. When it was proposed in 1882 that the Irish practice whereby soldiers performed police duties should be adopted in Egypt, the then secretary for war, H.C.E. Childers, outlined to Gladstone the War Office's objections to this policy:

The question is not with me in the least one of etiquette or professional prejudice. It is one of law. Soldiers under the army/military act can only obey a military officer on shore. They could not be tried for breaches of discipline and they might be liable to be tried for murder, if they obeyed anyone else. It is therefore most important to comply with the law. Merely calling a particular operation 'police duty' would not alter the legal position of a soldier."

Men and women like those who marched away from Mr Carney's farm carrying their farming implements as if they were rifles had, however, dictated the terms by which the Land War would be fought and the British army was forced to spend much of its time engaged in duties which under ordinary circumstances would be considered within the domain of the civil forces. In December 1881, the government appointed an auxiliary force drawn mainly from the army reserve to assist the RIC in the day-to-day policing of rural Ireland. Moreover, members of the Rifle Brigade and Guardsmen were often enlisted for protection duty. As Donal O'Sullivan points out in his history of policing in Ireland, it was not uncommon at this time to see 'two neat, well-turned-out Guardsmen, in white jackets, deep in the mountains of Kerry, protecting a herdsmen on an evicted farm."

In Ireland under the Land League, Clifford Lloyd described the capture and transportation of livestock as a particularly odious exercise that often required the assistance of the army. Lloyd, ill from recurrent bouts of malaria, set out on expeditions which 'frequently went on for four or five days running' to seize farm animals which would then be brought 'under a strong guard with fixed bayonets' to the nearest railway station. Referring to one of these expeditions in some depth, Lloyd informed his readership that 'this was a long and troublesome day's work, and I was suffering such pain that it was with difficulty I kept the saddle."

In Chapter 3 of Ireland under the Land League, Lloyd admitted that, in the parts of the country in which he was based, he had become increasingly associated with evictions and the seizure of stock and that this association made his job all the more arduous. While on a week-long expedition with an agent, a sheriff, 'sixty men of the 48th, under Captain Bell, sixty men of the Royal Irish Constabulary, thirty horses, and six army service-waggons, carrying the bedding, food, and necessities for the week, the sub-sheriff, with about ten subordinates', Lloyd was compelled to travel the countryside at night. As soon as he was seen approaching, however, church bells would be rung and the cattle he had come to seize would be hidden in old sheds or driven up the sides of mountains. Furthermore, the animals that he did succeed in seizing were regularly prevented passage through villages and towns. According to Lloyd, a sheriff embarking on this task in Kilmallock requested a force 'made up of a squadron of the Greys, detachments of the 39th, 48th and 93rd Regiments and Transport Corps, which, with about 300 of the Royal Irish Constabulary, make a total of about 900 men'. Lloyd described a separate incident when a gathering of men, women and children intent on 'wanton acts of rebellion against the law and the constituted authority of the land' blocked the streets of a village, forcing Lloyd to turn back and find an alternative route for the cattle. These expeditions, Lloyd acknowledged, generally concluded in the following manner. The cattle he had managed to confiscate were taken with difficulty to the railway station and loaded onto trucks. At that moment, the tenant-farmer who owned them would appear and pay the rent he owed. Lloyd would then allow the cattle to be unloaded and driven back through the countryside to the farms they had been taken from. Lloyd, perhaps signalling his displeasure at the failure of the landlord class to organize themselves as effectively, begrudgingly admitted that 'it spoke much for the strength of the Land League, when the tenants obeyed instructions costing them such an amount of annoyance and money."

Hunting was one activity that brought the often-isolated landed elite together and emphasized the bonds that existed between them. The feeling of camaraderie achieved when hunting foxes, hares and stags across tenanted land had a significance, therefore, beyond that of a mere pleasurable pastime. As stated in The Sportsman's year-book for 1881, 'there is no place and no pursuit, whether of business and pleasure, where men are so much made to feel of one family. Catholic farmers of substantial acreage were not prevented from taking part in such hunts, but their family-status was likely to be that of poor relation. As pointed out by L.P. Curtis, for Curtis, the very protest against the hunting campaign that marked one of the most significant moments in the history of families, Bence-Jones surmises that it was the Church of Ireland and the success of Home Rule candidates in the 1874 election.

---

76 "No men", in Carthy, Letters Lardner (11 Nov. 1881); 77 Children to Gladstone, 5 July 1881; BM Add. MSS 4999 cited in Hardman, An army on police work, 288–9; 78 O'Sullivan, The Irish revolution, 1822–92, 94, 95.

As Curtis's article suggests, contemporary accounts of the anti-hunting agitation point to a number of links between this agitation and the holding of 'suspects' under the Protection of Persons and Property Act. The Freeman's Journal, primarily concerned about the effects of the agitation on the business community in Ireland, produced daily reports on both the interference with hunting and the response of hunt committees to this interference. In the earlier stages of the anti-hunting agitation, the newspaper provided an account of a meeting held by the Kilkenny Hunt committee who, having been denied access to a number of coverts in the area, wished to ascertain 'the views of the farmers of the county of Kilkenny with regard to the continuance of fox hunting'. A man named Mr Dowling addressed the meeting and told those present that the farmers would be in favour of hunting if the members of the hunt club signed a memorial for the release of the 'suspects arrested in that county'. At a similar meeting attended by the 'landholders of Kildare' and the Kildare Hunt, hunt members were likewise informed that an extensively signed petition to the government for the release of the 'suspects' would enable hunting to continue unperturbed. A number of days later, the newspaper reported that members of the Kildare Hunt, 'unanimously of opinion that hunting could not be resumed on the terms laid down in those resolutions', had resolved to discontinue hunting and sell their stud of hunters in England.

An editorial in the Leinster Leader on 26 November 1881 condemned the poisoning of hounds, but interprets the agitation against hunting as the inevitable outcome of a dispute that dated back to the arrest of C.S. Parnell as a 'suspect':

It is now announced that there will be no further hunting in Kildare. The resolutions passed against fox-hunting at the convention held in Naas, on the day of Mr Parnell's arrest, and the action taken by the farmers almost everywhere through the county, in conformity with that resolution, left no doubt as to the result.

---

The editorial informed the newspaper's readership that following the Nenagh convention, negotiations taking place had begun to break down when it was discovered that the hunt committee had failed to prevent certain members from participating in the hunt.

The gentlemen who have made themselves obnoxious as landlords or magistrates, may have been privately requested to stay at home, but when the list of those who put in an appearance at Johnstown, on the opening day, was published, it was generally felt that a direct defiance had been given to the people, and that the entire people of the country would resent it.

The result according to the Leinster Leader, was an "uprising [...] so universal" that further negotiations had become extremely difficult, if not impossible.

As these and other newspaper reports testify, Curtis is quite right to draw our attention to connections between disruptions to hunting and the detention of local and national Land League leaders under the Protection of Person and Property Act. What also becomes apparent when reading such reports, however, is the extent to which the agitation functioned as a vehicle for the articulation for a broad range of issues. In the series of events documented by the editor of the Leinster Leader, it is the failure of the Kildare Hunt committee to effectively enforce boycotts that leads to an irreversible breakdown in communication, the intensification of the campaign, and its spread throughout the countryside. The porous nature of the agitation is likewise evident in the report that appeared in the Freeman's Journal concerning the meeting held in Co. Kilkenny.

After Mr Dowling urged the hunt members attending this meeting to sign a petition for the release of the 'suspects', he made the following proclamation: 'the day was gone by when the gentry could ride rough-shod over them; when they could trample upon them and kick their faces off.' One can only speculate that if hunting, for this farmer, could function as an appropriate metaphor for rural power relations, the ability to dictate the terms by which hunting would be allowed to continue must have represented an at least partial inversion of the social and political order.

Hunting and the anti-hunting agitation is assigned a similar role in Anthony Trollope's The Land League, a novel that is set in the west of Ireland during the Land War and focused primarily on the threat that the modes of resistance that made up this conflict posed to social hierarchies. Having been informed that 'the people were about to rise and interfere with fox-hunting', Trollope's fictional master of the hounds, Tom Daly, leads the hunt to the cover of Moytubber, determined 'to protect the rights of others in the pursuit of their favourite amusement'. Upon arrival, however, he discovers that the covert has been surrounded by a crowd which includes Kit Mooney, a tenant-farmer who, in the period prior to the Land War, would at this moment have been touching his hat to Tom Daly, and whispering to him of the fox that had lately been seen 'stalking away just there. Mr Daly, I fear almost very eyes'. Kit Mooney does step forward to address Tom Daly, but the words that he chooses to greet him with suggest that this confrontation is a deliberate parody of the servile encounter related above. As a dispirited Tom Daly watches the crowds gather and wander indiscriminately through the gorse, Kit Mooney cheerfully informs him that 'there is not a boy in the barony but what is out to bid yer honour welcome this morning'. For Sir Nicholas Bodkin, a local landlord in Trollope's novel, it is Kit Mooney's mockery of feudal authority which suggests that rural power relations have been so transformed as to make hunting a thing of the past. In the following pages, I will draw attention to the symbolic functions served by both the hunt and the forms of resistance that made up the anti-hunting agitation. What this analysis should make clear is that while the arrest of 'suspects' under the Protection of Person and Property Act functioned as an immediate stimulus for the agitation against hunting, the underlying roots of this agitation are, as is recognized in Trollope's The Land League, to be found elsewhere.

For members of the local hunt, the pursuit of preserved game across fields and over ditches and fences provided, as Curtis claims, 'adventure with an aristocratic flavour'. Two of the most prolific writers of the hunt, Edith Somerville and Martin Ross, referred on a number of occasions to the sheer pleasure of the hunt. In Irish memories, Edith Somerville, attempting to explain the central role that hunting had been assigned in their writings, described how 'much of the fun we have had in our lives has been "owed to horse and hound"'. With reference to a character who appears in the novel, Dan Russell the fox, Somerville stated that 'we', like Katherine, have known "the glory of feeling a big horse jumping big out of his stride", while the bounds 'fleeted and sped, and the river of their music flowed back to her', and like her too, we have "galloped in it, and there was nothing else in Heaven or earth". Nonetheless, as Somerville was to note in Irish memories, hunting in Ireland was never a mere recreational activity. In Somerville and Ross's descriptions of the hunt, as in other contemporary accounts, it is clear that hunting not only fostered class solidarity within the Ascendancy, but was one of the main means through which a part...
ticular relationship between that class, the poorer rural dwellers and the land could be both defined and maintained. Looking back with nostalgia to the days when her brother kept hounds, Edith Somerville outlined the multi-faceted nature of the hunt: 'we had the best of sport and learned to know the people and the country in the way that hunting alone can teach'.

If we are to accept Somerville and Ross's claim that hunting enabled the Anglo-Irish landlord class to establish a relationship with the 'people' and the land, it would be useful to ask some questions concerning the type of relationship fostered by the hunt.

Two very different accounts of that relationship can be found towards the end of 1880 in the Irish SPORTSMAN AND WEEKLY NEWS. In the initial phase of the anti-hunting agitation, the Irish SPORTSMAN nervously reminded its readership that sport in Ireland, particularly hunting, 'has ever formed a strong bond of union among all classes'. The following month, a 'strong bond' created by the hunt had been placed under some strain by the 'systematic efforts of the farmers to prevent hunting'; efforts that had 'intensified' the bitterness of feeling now unap­

In contrast, for the editor of the WEEKLY NEWS, it was hunting, not the anti-hunting agitation, that fostered rural tensions. According to the editorial, 'Shall there be hunting?', a hunt comprised mainly of the propertied class that travelled freely over the land worked by the Irish tenantry provided a very visual representation of relations of dominance and subordination: 'the sporting gentry' could no longer ride over their tenants' fields as they had done 'in the good old times' when they felt themselves lords and masters of the population around them.

In the overall terms of their arguments, however, both sets of journalists are in agreement: the hunt was an important component in preserving rural class relations, while the anti-hunting agitation posed a threat to the status quo.

Like the fox that Somerville and Ross associated in their writings with the Irish Ascendancy, the hunt roamed at will over the tenants' land. Though both were enthusiastic participants in the hunt, Somerville and Ross were more than willing to admit that it rode 'sometimes, it is to be feared, where it should not have ridden'. In his analysis of the silver fox, Declan Kiberd points out that Somerville and Ross were 'too fastidious to blind themselves to the criticisms that were directed at the hunting class:' Nevertheless, in Somerville and Ross's recollections of the hunt, as in other less critical contemporary descriptions of hunting, members of the hunt enjoy a special relationship with the land and its features. As can be ascertained from the following passage taken from Wheeltricks, for Somerville and Ross the countryside was an active participant in this relationship, throwing up huge ditches, scenic cliff-tops and steep inclines:

We were hunting on the hills, after a time of very wet weather, when a fox jumped up under our feet. The hounds took him at a great pace along the rough ridge of the hill, and then swung seawards, right down its wet, steep, southern side [...] We followed the hounds over the edge of the hill. It was steep enough to make the drops off the fences seem pretty heavy, but not too steep. Soon, however, we came to a slope as steep as was possible for horses to attempt, and Crowley and I, in the lead, had hardly gone more than a horse's length downwards when we felt the boggy fleece of soaking sedge and heather beginning to slide under us [...] After a few panting moments, we arrived at a level place, and our progress arrested. I looked back, and there I saw the side of the hill, a sheet of wet, shining rock, that we had scalped as bare as the skull of an Indian warrior's victim.1

In such writings, features in the landscape serve no function save that designated by the hunt. The hill that perhaps marks the boundary between two tenants' properties merely works to demonstrate the aristocratic recklessness of the members of the hunt who neglect it and subsequently conquer its sheer slopes. Indeed, the only land boundaries that tended to be observed in accounts of hunting were those established by hunt committees:

The boundaries of a hunting country are not infrequently a contentious matter, but in West Carbery we have no trespassers, neither do we trespass. The Atlantic Ocean half-circles us on the south and west, and is a boundary that admits of no dispute; on the east there is a margin of thirty miles or so between us and any rivals, and northward we might run up the coast to Donegal without poaching.2

This is an unoccupied landscape, devoid of inhabitants save for the 'country boys' who, we are frequently informed in both literary and non-literary accounts of hunting, passively observe the hunt from a hilltop. Given these descriptions, it comes as no surprise that the empress of Austria's visits occupy such a prominent place in Mark Bence-Jones's narrative: The 'country people [...] went miles in the hope of catching a glimpse of her,' gathering up 'the tiny lace handkerchiefs which she took out with her when hunting' and watching her take 'the banks and ditches more recklessly than the most dare-devil Irish'. In the triadic relationship that is the focus of most accounts of the hunt, it is the huntsmen/women and the land that actively engage with each other, congenial sparring partners displaying themselves to the poorer rural inhabitants.

As Declan Kiberd reminds us in Irish dasans, 'the hunt had always expressed the sovereignty of an upper class'. The dethroned Gaelic aristocracy of 1600 also hunted and, as Kiberd deduces from the Gaelic song, 'Seán Ó Dubhthach ghabh mearann', were equally impervious to the damage that could result from this activity:

In bean go dūbhadh sa bhealacha
Ag áirimh a cuid géan [...]
And a woman left sadly in the way counting her geese [...]?

In late nineteenth-century Ireland, when the total number of meets prior to the Land War averaged around one hundred and fifty during each week of the eight-month hunting season, hunting functioned as a conspicuous reminder of Ascendancy presence. The designated role of the tenant-farmers and labourers in this ritualized creation of spectacle was that of onlooker and sometimes recipient of payment for damage to crops, livestock and fences on the 'little fields', which, Edith Somerville and Martin Ross admitted, could 'look very dingy'.

The act of hunting was, therefore, a symbolic and indeed very real assertion of ownership over the fields trampled by the horses' hooves. The pursuit of game over land occupied by the Irish tenantry, regardless of how these hunts were conducted, functioned as a physical enactment of property rights.

What was recognized at the Durrrow League Branch meeting referred to by Curtis as one of the sources of the anti-hunting agitation was that the triadic relationship established by the hunt and the notion of power relations and property rights it encapsulated was open to challenge. When the Reverend Edward Rowan, secretary of the Durrrow League Branch, informed the master of the Queen's County Hounds that the tenant-farmers could prevent the hunt from using 'their lands' (my emphasis), he was making it clear to the hunt committee that while the tenantry generally tolerated hunting over the land they occupied, they considered it to be a privilege that could potentially be withdrawn. By the middle of November 1884, a very different relationship between the land, the hunt and the poorer rural occupants begins to emerge in newspaper coverage:

The moment they went away with their fox a number of people, who had been assembling there for some time before, commenced shouting and blowing horns to interfere with the hunt. The hounds, however, ran down to Glangoole, near Hon. Colonel White's property, where the people were found to have gathered all along the neighbouring hills, having with them a lot of mongrel hounds and other dogs, which they let loose on the foxhounds, while using at the same time violent language to those who were out with the hunt. One gentleman from the neighbourhood of Thurles was stoned, himself and his horse receiving several blows. He rode up in a fence to escape this violence, but a number of persons attacked him with sticks and forced his horse down a very steep and dangerous place [...]. Immediately outside the demesne the crowds were found to have assembled again in large numbers, shouting and conducting themselves in the most violent manner. Owing to the violence they then displayed the hunt could not go on to Coalbrook, which was to have been the next draw. It was then hurriedly resolved to proceed to Garrancole, but the crowd assuming a very threatening attitude in that direction, this intention had likewise to be abandoned.

The master [...] determined upon going to Prout's Furze, where everything was found apparently quiet. Here the huntsman dismounted and tied his mare to the fence, getting inside it himself to view the fox away [...]. Immediately a young man, who was observed coming down the hill-side, untied the mare, and vaulting with the greatest ability into the saddle, galloped away. The master of the hounds [...] followed at once in pursuit, accompanied by the few members of the field who had then remained with him. The people collected round and began yelling and shouting as before. However, the horse was captured after a most exciting and lengthened chase. The hounds were then with much difficulty got together, and the hunt retired, followed for some distance through the fields and along the roads by the crowd. 8 the progress of the Tipperary Hounds and anticipate any sudden changes in its destination. A very steep and dangerous place is no longer there to display the reckless courage of those on horseback, but works with the crowd to demonstrate their helplessness. The 'country boys' who watch from the hilltops are now an active and threatening presence. The huntsman of the Tipperary Hounds who dismounts and ties his horse to a fence is reduced to a passive spectator when a young man, who was observed coming down the hill-side, displays his own reckless courage to the watching crowds.

Though seldom described in such dramatic terms as the above confrontation, the Freeman's Journal provided extensive coverage of an agitation it defined as 'momentous' and somewhat baffling. For a paper that regularly dedicated an entire page to hunting appointments and, in an article on the empress of Austria's visit in 1879, had spoken with pride of 'the hunt now famed all the world over', the anti­ hunting agitation was a surprising and not altogether welcome development.8

The social tensions that the hunt could generate were certainly not evident to Kildare co-owners of hunting property who condescended to stop hunting if they like, but we think they ought not to do so without having most carefully considered all the pros and cons.9

Nevertheless, at the agitation's climax at the end of December 1881 and beginning of January 1882, the Freeman's Journal was producing up to eight articles a day on the threat the anti-hunting protesters were posing to the hunting community. Most of these reports provide us with only the barest of detail.

Under the title, 'Preventing a hunt', we are told that 'the Killimer Hunt, near Kilkenny yesterday', but owing to the opposition of the tenants, who threat­ ed to maim the dogs and horses, the members were compelled to abandon the meet for the present. In Kildare on 23 November, an unfortunate incident occurred in the poisoning of two hounds. It is supposed they took the poison when defending Castlekealy covert.

One of the hounds died in the course of the run, and the other dropped dead after the run was over. The Master immediately stopped all further hunting [...] In the consequence of the loss of the two hounds, added to that of a third hound, which was poisoned near Gkinden on the previous day [...] the master has decided to hunt no longer, and has virtually cancelled all future fixtures.10

This report, as is the case with the previous newspaper reports I have cited, provides far greater insight into the reactions of the hunt members than those of the protesters. If we divide these articles into statements concerning the men, women and children who were preventing the hunts and statements concerning those who were participating in the hunts, a number of discrepancies can be noted. The sections of the reports that are concerned with the anti-hunt protesters tell us about their actions. They shout, blow horns, threaten with sticks and poison hounds. The information we are provided with relating to members of the hunt is quite different. We are not only given details telling us of their actions, we are privy to their thoughts. We are told what hunt members 'resolved' to do, what they had 'determined to do, what they felt compel­ ped to do, what had been their intention' and what they had 'decided'.

Consequently, it is through the thoughts and decisions of the members of the Tipperary Hounds, the Killimer Hunt and the Kildare Hounds that these episodes are related to us.

The problems that we encounter when relying on newspaper reports as a source of information about the anti-hunting agitation and those who were involved in it are typical of the problems faced by those studying accounts of popular unrest. As Ranajit Guha has pointed out in relation to India, 'evidence of this type has a way of stamping the interests and outlook of the rebels' 'enemies on every account of our peasant rebellions'. In Elementary aspects of peasant insurgency in colonial India, Guha warns us not only about the biased nature of official records (police reports, administrative accounts, etc.), but also about non-official sources, such as nationalist newspapers, which he claims are equally prone to speak with an 'elite' voice. This does not mean, however, that newspapaper articles such as those I have cited should be simply condemned and ignored. These reports may be primarily concerned with registering the effects of the agitation on those who it was directed against, but the reactions of those the agitation affected were predicated on the actions of the anti-hunt protesters. Even reports which interpreted the agitation from the perspective of the hunt members can be a useful source of information, not only concerning the effect of the agitation on hunting, but also about the nature of the agitation itself.
According to an article that appeared on 25 November 1881, 'to-day the Wexford Hounds were stopped hunting at Muffin by a large crowd of farmers and labourers. [...] In consequence of the opposition the hounds were withdrawn.' The following week, in consequence of the Wexford Foxhounds having met with serious opposition on five days out of seven since the beginning of regular hunting, it is deemed useless to issue a new list of hunting appointments. An article published the same day, 'An attack on the Dahlaway Hounds', tells us that 'a large mob assembled, stoned the hounds, and assaulted the huntsmen, completely putting a stop to all hunting.' This article was accompanied by another, 'More hunts stopped', in which it was reported that the Tipperary Hounds were stopped by a mob, who stoned the huntsmen and prevented sport being continued. A few days later, the newspaper carried a report on the Carlow and Island Hounds who are said to have been stopped by 'a large crowd of men, men and boys, all armed with stout sticks.' An article that appeared on 7 December tells us that the Clonmel Harriers were prevented from hunting by 'a crowd of about one hundred persons' who 'stoned the animals, killing two and wounding five.' The United Hunt made an appearance in the newspaper three days later, when it was reported that members of the hunt were confronted near Riversdown by 'a crowd of nearly three hundred persons, with pitchforks and sticks' who 'beat off the huntsmen [...] and compelled them to retire.' These reports provide us with few details concerning the motivations of those who took part in the anti-hunting agitation, but collectively they allow us to draw two important conclusions concerning the nature of the agitation: first, that it was widespread and, second, that it was effective. As the field sports correspondent of the Irish Times was to report towards the end of December 1881, 'the scenes and actions of the anti-hunting protesters had insured that hunting was practically extinct in a country which for well nigh a century stood in the very forefront of all matters appertaining to the chase.'

Other articles published in the Freeman's Journal and the Leinster Leader provide us with a more detailed account of the words and actions of the protesters and demonstrate the extent to which the agitation was to fuse local disputes with issues acknowledged by such newspapers to be of national importance. On 12 November 1881, the editor of the Leinster Leader, discussing the effects of anti-hunting agitation on the Kildare Foxhounds, the Kilkenny Hunt, the Queen's County Hounds and the Newbridge Harriers, pointed out that over the previous week the newspaper's offices had received an unprecedented number of visits from tenant-farmers stating that they would not allow any hunting over their lands until the political prisoners had been released. The editorial also reported, however, on resolutions passed in Queen's County the previous Monday. Hunting would not be allowed to continue in that county 'whilst the servers of writs and guardians of Emergency Associations appear in the hunting field' and until 'the Middlemount and Ballykealy tenants are fully and fairly settled with.' In some parts of the country all hunts were disrupted, while in other districts the presence of certain individuals associated in the locality with evictions, sheriffs' sales and other unpopular proceedings could result in the prevention of a hunt that might otherwise have proceeded unimpeded. A letter, signed 'landholder', that was sent to the Freeman's Journal at the end of November 1881, sought to clarify this latter position for the newspaper's readership:

Let no man say there is hostility to sport in Kildare. There is none. But there is a decided and valid objection lodged against some few members of the hunt endangering their precious carcasses in future over the banks of Kildare, and I would suggest to these parties to stay at home, as they have a perfect legal right to do, but as far as I am a lawyer, no legal right to trespass on me or anyone else.

According to the Freeman's Journal, in November 1881 several hundred men assembled at a covert at Knock with pitchforks, scythes, hedge-slashers, and other weapons' with the intention of obstructing Lord Huntingdon's hunting party 'in the event of some obnoxious person of the district being amongst them'. On ascertaining that the man they were searching for was not present, the crowd 'quietly dispersed.' One of the earliest recorded confrontations between members of a hunt and anti-hunting protesters took place on 3 October 1881 near Coolnamuck, Co. Waterford, when a group of tenant-farmers and labourers surrounded a hunt that included the special resident magistrate for the Waterford and Tipperary region, Captain Owen R. Slacke. As the demonstrators jeered the hunters, a woman is reported to have thrown a branch across Captain Slacke's saddle and threatened to 'hamstring' his horse if he ever attempted to ride across her farm. As these and other newspaper accounts indicate, the anti-hunting agitation could be interpreted in a number of different ways by those partaking in it. Indeed, the popularity and, therefore, effectiveness of the agitation might best be attributed to its multifaceted nature. Some of those who gathered to obstruct hunts sought to make public their disapproval of coercive legislation, while others were motivated by the failure of hunt committees to effectively enforce boycotts on unpopular land agents, officials and ‘emergency men’. What the tenant-farmers who walked into the offices of the Leinster Leader shared with the ‘landholder’ who wrote to the Freeman’s Journal and the woman who threw a branch at Captain Slacke’s horse, however, was a desire to assert control over the land they occupied and determine the conditions under which others might gain access to it. The tenant-farmers would not allow any hunting on their lands until the political prisoners had been released. The ‘landholder’ argued that the hunt members had ‘no legal right to trespass on me or anyone else’. The woman in Waterford warned Captain Slacke against riding across her farm. On 14 November 1881 the Freeman’s Journal reported on the attempts of Mr Murray, a tenant-farmer from Tullutown, to enforce a legal recognition of his right to control access to the property he leased. During a weekly petty session held in Co. Westmeath, Mr Murray summoned Mr J.C. Lyons, master of barriers, and Mr J.W. Norton ‘with riding over his land in following the hunt’. The judge, having expressed a hope that ‘the farmers of Westmeath were not going to follow the example of some farmers throughout Ireland’, dismissed Mr Murray’s case as ‘most wanton proceeding on behalf of the complainant’. In his history of Irish policing from 1822 to 1922, Donal J. O’Sullivan describes the ‘fishing of privately owned rivers and lakes and hunting over ground which was privately owned or preserved’ as a common feature of the Land War period. At a time when tenant-farmers were warning hunt members against trespassing on their land, an increasing number of allegations of trespassing and poaching were being filed against tenant-farmers and labourers. At the beginning of November 1881, the Irish Sporuatn was proud to announce that ‘in Ireland poaching has not assumed the dimensions of a national vice, has never come to add its quota to the sum total of our national troubles’. Less than two months later, an article on salmon poaching proclaimed the banks of Irish rivers ‘infested by gangs of lawless marauders’ and demanded that more water-bailiffs be made available. The Freeman’s Journal was likewise to express concern over the sharp rise in salmon poaching, pre-empting the Irish Sportsman’s support for greater levels of vigilance:

The nightly affrays, the attacks on bailiffs, and the prosecutions reported from day to day in our columns show that salmon poaching this year is unusually prevalent, so that we are not altogether surprised to hear rumours of legislative interference to secure better observance of the close season.

Unlike the Irish Sportsman, however, the Freeman’s Journal was unwilling to condemn out of hand an activity that it admitted had a ‘popular aspect’ to it. Poachers, according to this nationalist newspaper, could be denounced as ‘unnaturally, unpatriotic’, but it may be contended that the element of water by sea and land, together with all contained therein, is the common property of all. Ultimately, however, the author of the article concluded that salmon was at present the ‘luxury of the rich’ and while he regretted that this luxury food could not ‘descend to the table of the poor’, he argued that the preservation of salmon was essential to the Irish business community. As was recognized by the author of this article on salmon poaching, poaching is a criminal offence with significant invasive undertones. Taking food considered the ‘luxury of the rich’ and serving it up on ‘the table of the poor’ has long been considered a highly-symbolic crime that posed a threat not only to the material wealth of the gentry, but also to their prestige. In eighteenth-century England, Ranajit Guha reminds us, poaching ‘allowed the lower classes to share with the gentry such food and sport as were considered to be the exclusive symbols of privileged status’, and was, therefore, in the eyes of the English landed aristocracy, not only the theft of a deer or salmon, but, more significantly, the theft of a particular form of social capital. Hoping to ‘save the food of the gods from desecration of the underdogs’, members of the aristocracy put pressure on the king to legislate against poaching in the draconian Black Act of 1723. Describing poaching as ‘the most defiant of all rural crimes’, Guha suggests that this activity is intimately linked to rural power relations, with a marked increase in the incidence of poaching commonly preceding agrarian uprisings. As is suggested in the previous paragraph, in Ranajit Guha’s analysis of Indian peasant rebellion, crime and insurgency are interlinked, but derived from two contrasting codes of behaviour and, therefore, clearly distinguishable from one.

Notes:
another. Unlike criminal offences (such as poaching) which ‘must rely on secrecy to be effective’, insurgency, Guha tells us, ‘is necessarily and invariably public and communal’. Consequently, in Guha’s work, insurgency is the very antithesis of crime, with the criminal standing in the same relation to the insurgent as does what is ‘consensual’ (or public) to what is ‘secretive’ (or open). or what is individualistic (or small-group) to what is communal (or mass) in character.19

These distinctions are difficult to maintain, however, when applied to the events that made up the Irish Land War. Poaching towards the end of 1881 may have included the ‘nightly affairs’ that the Freeman’s Journal referred to in its article on Irish salmon, 20 but even small-scale poaching at this time could be openly confrontational. On 28 November 1881, the Freeman’s Journal reported on an ‘extraordinary affair’ that took place on the property of Dowager Lady Massy. Five tenant-farmers caught poaching on this property with greyhounds were prosecuted and fined, but returned later with a large body of men and proceeded to hunt in full view of the gamekeeper and his assistants. According to the Freeman’s Journal, ‘an immense amount of damage was done, and a large number of game killed’ as a result of this defiant behaviour.21 In a letter to the editor of the Freeman’s Journal the following week, one of the ‘poachers’ present on that day rejected legal and cultural distinctions between ‘sportsmen’ and ‘poachers’ and sought to establish a new set of terms through which his ‘day’s pleasure hunting’ could be interpreted. In this alternative version of events, five men did go onto Dowager Lady Massy’s property with dogs for the purpose of hunting, but they had a ‘perfect right’ to be there ‘having got permission from the tenants therein’. When the gamekeeper ‘accosted us and told us the lands were preserve[d], and not to hunt on them’, the men were on land occupied by Thomas Byrne, who had ‘invited us to hunt on his farm’. The men informed the gamekeeper that ‘we had leave to hunt from the tenant, who was present, and who told us to hunt away as long as we wished to’. The gamekeeper took down our names to summon us, but we did not mind but hunted away as ‘fines had no right to be imposed on us’.22

Poaching, which, as Guha claims, is generally characterized by individualistic or small-group defiance from the law, was transformed in Ireland in the early 1880s into an act of collective social defiance. The tenant-farmer who removed game from a landlord’s property in the middle of the night broke laws against poaching, but the men who continued to hunt in front of Lady Massy’s gamekeeper did so in open defiance of these laws and the authority behind them. Both sets of ‘poachers’ were defying the landlords’ absolute right over the land and the animals that lived on it, but in the latter case the ‘poachers’ were also refusing to accept the rationale through which their actions were judged to be illegal.

Denying the hunt access to the land the tenant-farmers occupied was only one facet of the anti-hunting agitation. The protesters were not merely preventing hunt members from entering their farm-lands, they were challenging a social order that often gave landlords sole rights to the animals that roamed these properties.23 On 17 December 1881, the Freeman’s Journal reported on a crowd of ‘500 people’ who had gathered to prevent the Galway Hounds hunt and then ‘with a number of dogs, started a fox, which escaped’.24 The ‘crowd of about three hundred farmers’ who confronted the Westmeath Hunt in the same month were said to have killed a fox, which they displayed ‘fastened on a long pole’.25 The Freeman’s Journal told of a hunt near Tullimore which ‘was stopped yesterday by a body of over 1000 persons, the farmers refusing to allow the land to be crossed. A dead fox was hoisted on a pole by the mob’.26

Towards the end of December 1881, the anti-hunting agitation was increasingly dominated by the event commonly referred to as the ‘people’s hunt’ or the ‘Land League hunt’. In ‘Stopping the hunt, 1881–1882’, L.P. Curtis Jr provides a brief analysis of this counter-hunting agitation, describing how large crowds would meet, through word of mouth or printed notice, to stage their own hunt. From the perspective of the landlords who held the sporting rights over the fields where these hunts took place, and also, in the opinion of a number of more recent commentators like Curtis, the gathering of tenant-farmers and labourers with their dogs in search of ‘protected’ hares, rabbits, foxes and gamebirds amounted to ‘mass poaching exercises’.27 In contrast to the furriest labourer hiding a hare under his coat in the middle of the night, the ‘people’s hunts’ were, however, public and ceremonial occasions often followed by celebrations as festive as the hunt balls that took place at the end of the hunting season.

One of the first recorded events of this type took place near Clogheen, where, according to an article published in the Freeman’s Journal on 17 November, ‘an immense crowd, accompanied by greyhounds, mongrels, and dogs of every description [. . .] extended themselves in one unbroken line of two miles through the country [. . .] killing upwards of sixty hares and rabbits’.28 The incidence of people’s hunts appears to have peaked just over six weeks later on St. Stephen’s Day.
Day, with hunts reported as having took place at Nenagh, Birr (Limerick), Hook, Latoon, Cashel, Dockdonnie, Moycashel, Streamstown and Birr. The 26th of December, according to an editorial in the Freeman's Journal, 'saw the country dotted over with little armies of linked constabulary and military, each attended by its doctor and train of ambulance wagons, wearily struggling after a hunt here and there — in this district or that. In response to notices posted in the surrounding countryside, Nenagh in Co. Tipperary was host on St Stephen's Day to 'one of the wildest scenes ever witnessed in the South of Ireland'. The 57th Regiment, who were drafted in from Limerick to prevent the hunt taking place, encountered crowds of peasants and others, on foot and on horseback, all wending their way from different points to the appointed place. One of the largest groups to assemble during the Land War period was on St Stephen's Day at Birr, when a crowd estimated by newspaper journalists to comprise of ten thousand men, women and children hunted for game on land from which they had previously expelled an official hunt. Following the hunt, the participants, holding up Land League banners and poles from which dead animals were suspended, are reported to have marched after a band of musicians past members of the RIC who, according to L.P. Curtis Jr, wisely refrained from interfering with the proceedings.

The hunts that took place at Birr, Nenagh and elsewhere intervened in the Irish political arena on a number of different levels. As previously stated, they challenged the landlords' ownership of the land and their sole right to the animals that inhabited it. People's hunts were also acts of inversion in that large-scale hunting with dogs was widely considered to be a gentleman's sport with certain game, such as deer, restricted to the tables of the rich. Many recorded details of subversive hunts suggest an engagement with what were considered to be some of the important political issues of the day. At a hunt that took place in Co. Waterford, a number of dogs wore collars inscribed with such names as 'No Rent', 'Forster', 'Marwood', 'Goddard' and 'Boycott', while it was common practice for animals killed during people's hunts to be publicly divided among the families of those interned under the Protection of Person and Property Act. The 'immense crowds' that gathered in November 1881 for a hunt in the neighbourhood of Clogheen, for example, 'killed upwards of sixty horses and rabbits, and having done so marched into Clogheen, and distributed them amongst families of 'suspects'.' This method of distribution allowed those partaking in such hunts to clearly distinguish their actions from poaching for personal gain and demonstrate that, when participating in a 'people's hunt', they were engaging in a political act.

Notices announcing the formation of the Irish National Hunting Club, the National Hunting Association, and the National Terrier and Sheep Dog Hunt that were posted in towns and villages throughout Ireland in December 1881 suggest that the people's hunts were interpreted by tenant-farmers and labourers not as criminal acts of poaching, but as a form of activity that looked to an alternative concept of legality. In contrast, for the editor of the Freeman's Journal the law was quite simply the law and, under its dictates, Land League hunts were 'distinctly illegal'. Reminding his readership that in every letting, almost without a single exception, throughout the entire country, the game is reserved to the landlord, and even on his own holding a tenant has no right to destroy it, he implored 'the people to discontinue a practice so unjustifiable in itself, and so fraught, in our opinion with danger'. Two days prior to the appearance of this editorial, however, the page-layout of an edition of the Freeman's Journal suggested a very different understanding of 'people's hunts'. As was generally the practice, the title 'Sporting intelligence' was positioned on page seven of the newspaper. Under this heading, a number of subheadings supplied information on hunts that had taken place over the previous days, hunts that bad been subject to interference by protesters and meets that were scheduled to take place over the coming days. What was unusual about this edition of the Freeman's Journal, however, was a section that was positioned next to 'Sporting intelligence', replicating its every stylistic detail. Printed in the same size lettering and similarly underlined, the heading 'The Land League hunts' was followed by eleven subheadings relining of 'people's hunts' that had taken place over the previous days, 'people's hunts' that had been subject to interference by the military and police, and hoax hunts. Thus in one week the Freeman's Journal offered two opposing interpretations of subversive hunts: 'people's hunts' as illegal acts of poaching and 'people's hunts' as a form of activity that challenged the idea of poaching as defined in Ireland at that time.

During the month of January 1882, the incidence of both 'people's hunts' and interference with official hunts gradually decreased. L.P. Curtis Jr explains this trend with reference to a number of external factors. Towards the end of December 1881, he informs us, a circular was issued throughout Ireland informing resident magistrates and the constabulary that 'people’s hunts' were to be dealt with as illegal assemblies. By the beginning of January 1882, the military and police were dispersing hunts and making arrests in nearly every part of the country. Curtis also directs our attention to a notice that accompanied the 'Hunting appointments' for the Kildare Harriers and Newbridge Harriers in the Leinster Leader in November 1881: 'Gentlemen are most earnestly requested not to ride over New Grass, Corn or Turnips.' For Curtis, this notice suggests that, in the aftermath of the anti-hunting agitation, members of hunts still in operation were acknowledging that their hunting activities could only continue if the tenantry allowed them to do so.

Curtis is quite right to list tough measures and a change in attitudes among the factors that brought about a cessation of the anti-hunting agitation. A number of articles and notices that appeared in the Freeman’s Journal and Leinster Leader at the height of the agitation demonstrate that those partaking in official hunts were beginning to redefine their relationship to the land and those who worked it. In December 1881, the executive committee of the Ward Hounds, pointing out that 'the landholders in the hunt district have been in the most indulgent, not to say slave-like, position', noted that 'the Ward country [...] must be treated again as a hunting ground for the general body of hunting men who have hitherto enjoyed sport with packs which have ceased for the present to hunt'. The Meath Hunt issued a similar statement that month, informing disbanded hunts that 'in future only the members of the Meath Hunt and residents in the county should attend its meets, the fields having increased beyond what may be considered fair to the farmers whose lands are hunted over'. Following an observation in the Leinster Leader in November 1881 that there were a number of ‘refugees from the more aristocratic relations that exist between the farmers and the members of the hunt may not be interrupted by the intrusion of objectionable individuals’. These articles and notices, the use of land occupied by the tenantry for the purpose of hunting is interpreted as a privilege that could potentially be withdrawn if abused.

Furthermore, there can be no doubt that the increased military and police presence had an effect on the counter-hunting agitation. On St Stephen’s Day, the ‘people’s hunt’ at Birrally Castle was ‘met and dispersed by the military and police who had information respecting the expedition’, while the Millstreet

---

56 Curtis, ‘Hunting notes: the Wm! Law of November 1881 that there were a number of ‘refugees from the more aristocratic relations that exist between the farmers and the members of the hunt may not be interrupted by the intrusion of objectionable individuals’. These articles and notices, the use of land occupied by the tenantry for the purpose of hunting is interpreted as a privilege that could potentially be withdrawn if abused.

57 Curtis, ‘Shutting the hunt’, 685–86, 687–9. 99 ‘Hunting appointments’, Leinster Leader (25 Nov. 1881). 96 ‘Hunting notes: the Wm! Law of November 1881 that there were a number of ‘refugees from the more aristocratic relations that exist between the farmers and the members of the hunt may not be interrupted by the intrusion of objectionable individuals’. These articles and notices, the use of land occupied by the tenantry for the purpose of hunting is interpreted as a privilege that could potentially be withdrawn if abused.

Further, in ‘The United Hunt Club Hounds’, it stated in the Freeman’s Journal on 19 January that the obstruction which had been offered to the noble sport of foxhunting in this part of the country is fast dying out.

People’s hunts did decrease in number; in the month of January 1882, but before dying out they underwent a series of transformations designed to combat police and military strategies of counter-insurgency. Hunts were still advertised by both word of mouth and printed notice, but the information supplied through these mediums was often conflicting. Notices pinned to trees, gates and buildings supplied details concerning a hunt, while tenant-farmers and labourers would arrange by word of mouth to meet at a different time or location.

---

Popular Harriers’ found [Latoon] guarded by soldiers and police, and were cautioned under heavy penalties against crossing the lands. A report that appeared in the Cavanagh Telegraph on 31 December 1881 informed the newspaper’s readership that ‘300 soldiers of the 64th Regiment and a number of the Army Service Corps’ had been dispatched to a location near Athline to disperse a proclaimed Land League hunt. On 7 January 1882, the Freeman’s Journal tells of an incident that took place at Glenalva when police officers pursued and captured twenty-seven farmers [...] while others of the hunting party were pursued for miles over the country. A newspaper published in the Freeman’s Journal on 10 January, Clifford Lloyd described ‘people's hunts’ as illegal and intolerable, and for the future will assemble in the counties of Limerick and Clare at the peril of those joining in them, for they will be dispersed by the troops [...] who will use such means as are at their disposal and as may be necessary for the purpose.'

Consequently, the police and military were often engaged in searching for groups of tenant-farmers and labourers in remote districts, while the hunts they had come to prevent had either already taken place or were in the process of taking place elsewhere. As previously stated, on St Stephen’s Day a number of alternative hunts, including those held at Bently Castle and Latoon, were subject to interference by the authorities. In other parts of the country, the police and military had a less successful day. The ‘military and a large number of constabulary’ who ‘proceeded to a village called Nash, for the purpose of dispersing a “Land League hunt”, which was announced to be held there to-day’ found ‘no hunt of any description and […] had to return home’. Meanwhile ‘the hunt was carried out some miles distant, at the Flook’.29 Police drafted into Moate on Christmas Day to prevent a hunt due to take place some distance outside the town the following day travelled all night to reach the advertised location. The hunt, however, was held ‘at Dockdonnie, half a mile from Moate’ where ‘500 persons assembled and had two hours sport’.29 On 18 December, the Freeman’s Journal reported on a hunt announced by written notices, posted extensively about the county that the authorities had assumed would take place at Ballybran, the stated location. When the authorities arrived at Ballybran, however, the only hunters they saw at the meet were three little tinkins and one dog. The army and police perceived at once that they had been hoaxed, and hoaxed they were for a surety, for while they were drawn upon the ground word came to them that the hunt was going on at Mrs Moreland’s property, some five miles distant. The whole force immediately started for Rahoon, but when they got there the hunt had retired.30

The purpose of hoax hunts was not always, however, to divert the attention of the authorities from actual hunts. As the month of January progressed, it became increasingly common practice for hunts to be publicly advertised when no hunt was due to be held. According to the Freeman’s Journal, at Ballitore, ‘the authorities were completely hoaxed.’ After ‘waiting the greater part of the day it was found that no hunt was going to be held’ and the ‘force of infantry, hassars, and police’ returned to their bases.31 This is one of a number of accounts of policemen and soldiers marching for miles in search of hunts that never took place. Under the heading, ‘A bootless errand’, the Freeman’s Journal attempted to capture on page the sheer frustration experienced by the soldiers and police sent to break up a hoax hunt at Coumbe:

Marching and countermarching of troops and constabulary have taken place all day here […] They all marched to Coumbe, a mountain range lying along the western shores of Lough Derg, where it was expected that ‘a Land League hunt’ would be held to-day. Not a single person, however, put in an appearance at the appointed place, and the troops were marched back again, quite harassed after their visit to the mountains, where a storm of rain prevailed all day long. Other bodies of troops and constabulary were drafted to Tonnagney and Ogonellfor, near Killaloe, to stop hunts at those places, but the meets did not take place.32

By the end of January 1882, hoax hunts were still a relatively common phenomenon, but, as Curtis points out, people’s hunts were taking place far less frequently. The gradual reduction in the number of hunts should not, however, be attributed solely to external pressures, such as increased military and police presence.

Footnotes:

to the traditional calendar of rural Ireland, tending to 'peak' around the times of popular seasonal festivals, such as May Eve, May Day, Halloween (Samhain), November Eve, New Year's Eve and St Stephen's Day. Whiteboyism, Beames surmises, 'marched closely in time to the rhythms of peasant life'. For Martin Ross, St Stephen's Day was a 'holiday of the first importance' characterized by its links with fox-hunting. For the men, women and children who joined in 'people's hunts' on 26 December 1881, St Stephen's Day would have been associated with the hunting of a very different species of animal — the wren. The counter-hunting agitation was, therefore, intertwined with both subaltern and elite cultural practices. This agitation borrowed aspects from both the official hunts it threatened to displace and the rural rituals from which it perhaps gained much of its legitimacy.

While Beames is primarily concerned in the passage quoted above with forming links between agrarian agitation and festive days in the late eighteenth century, a notice banning 'hunting the wren' that was 'posted up extensively through the baronies of Ormonde, and Owney and Arra' in the latter half of December 1881 suggests that this intersection was still strong enough during the Land War period to be a cause of anxiety for the authorities. In addition, a number of articles published in the Freeman's Journal towards the end of December 1881 recognized 'people's hunts' and 'hunting the wrens' as interrelated activities. Under the heading 'Hunting the wren', for example, it was stated that notwithstanding notices posted in a number of 'disturbed' regions proclaiming this practice, 'the customary amusement of 'hunting the wren' was indulged pretty generally, and, in addition, hares to a large number were killed'. On 23 January 1882, the Freeman's Journal reported on the trial of twenty-seven men answering a charge of having taken part in a riotous and unlawful assembly at Moycashel and Streamstown on St Stephen's Day. The following interpretation of the day's events was put forward by the defence:

A few score of boys and men, following an immemorial usage, assembled on St Stephen's Day. Their quarry was not deer or fox, pleasant or hare, but that most persecuted of the feathered tribe, 'the wren, the king of all birds', and if when passing through a field a hare started under their feet, it was only human nature if a few of the people did pursue the flying animal a few yards across the preserved lands.
landlord-tenant relations in 1880s Ireland were characterized by a widespread refusal by tenant-farmers to recognize the absolute property rights of the landlord class. This refusal was evidenced by both the manner in which the tenant-farmer defined his/her relationship to the land, and the more active forms of protest that dominated the Land War, such as resistance to a landlord’s attempt to sell, lease, evict and hunt as he/she pleased. The land act that William Gladstone introduced in 1881 during his second administration was both a response to this widespread refusal and a recognition of the actual relationship between the Irish tenant-farmer and the land he/she occupied. Through this act, Gladstone sought, as George Campbell and the Bessborough Commission had advocated, to provide a legal framework for that relationship.

Ultimately, however, Gladstone’s measures altered the law in ways that even some members of his own government feared would interfere with accepted British legal principles, particularly in relation to the inviolability of the rights of property. As Philip Bull has pointed out in his study of the Irish land question, the social and political model that embodied these principles was relatively straightforward:

the ‘owners’ of the land are indeed its owners in absolute terms, with the right to sell or lease as they pleased and at whatever price allowed by the market. Any interference with these ‘property rights’ was anathema – property being central and sacred to the ‘old society’ and to the new capitalist order emerging in its place.

Anthony Trollope, fearful of the implications of such interference, interrupted the storyline of his Irish novel, The Landladies, on a number of occasions to comment on what he referred to as the misguided desire of some members of the Liberal Party to put up a new law devised by themselves in lieu of that time-honoured law by which property has ever been protected in England.

Trollope was not alone in arguing that to interfere with the market was to

---

88 Cited in Danziger, De jure et Jure, 249. 89 Guha, Elementary aspects, 30. 90 Ibid., 30, 38. The examples Guha cites exclude ‘the invention of Miss Hall’s men into London on the morning of Corpus Christi, 15 June 1887’, ‘peasant revolt in Germany during Patrocles 1841’, and ‘the threat of a massive uprising in Bombay during Mutiny and Dinadi in the year of the Mutiny’. 91 Ibid., 91, 92. 92 Moynahan, Anglo-Irish, 90.

---
salvage, who had predicted for some time that an assault on property rights would begin in Ireland and then spread to England, Scotland and Wales, described Gladstone as a mad man who had abrogated the historic right, that in Ireland where tenant-farmers did not accept the landlord as the absolute owner of the land, this so-called 'time-honoured law' of property ownership had proved untenable.

The first major Irish land act put through parliament, the Landlord and Tenant Law Amendment Act, 1860 - also known as Deasy's Act - had sought to assimilate Irish agriculture to English models. The anomalous nature of Irish land relations was to be 'regulated' through the abolition of customary tenant right and the enforcement of absolute rights of ownership as vested in the landlord. This act, described by Philip Bull as 'the last hurrah' of the confident English assumption that the spirit of Irish native culture could be subdued to the letter of British law and the tenets of British economic ideology, clarified the contractual nature of landlord-tenant relations and strengthened the power of the landlord in many areas, including eviction. Section 3 of Deasy's Act stated that the relation of landlord and tenant shall be deemed to be founded on the express or implied contract of the parties, and not upon tenure or service, and a reversion shall not be necessary to such relation, which shall be deemed to subsist in all cases in which there shall be an agreement by one party to hold land from or under another in consideration of any rent.6

As Hugh Collins points out in Marxism and law, Marxists have long held that the law of contract found in modern legal systems is intricately linked to the capitalist mode of production. In Frederick Engels' writings, for example, 'by changing all things into commodities, [capitalist production] dissolved all inherited and traditional relationships, and in place of time-honored custom and historic right, it set up purchase and sale, 'free' contract.7 The widespread exchange of commodities upon which the capitalist mode of production is so heavily reliant is legitimized and normalized by contract law. The contract in capitalist societies also functions to mask inequalities by suggesting that an exchange has been freely entered upon that will be of mutual benefit to all parties involved. As Engels states, 'a contract requires people who can dispose freely of their persons, actions, and possessions and meet each other on the footing of equal rights.'8 Indeed, Deasy's Act implies that it is the tenant who holds the position of power as he/she is the 'party' who initiates the 'agreement' to hold land in 'consideration of any rent'.

Applying contract law to land ownership and use in nineteenth-century Ireland proved, however, to be a problematic exercise. As is made clear in the passage cited from Deasy's Act, a contract requires those who engage in it to share certain assumptions about the nature of their relationship to the object of the contract. For a contract to function in the context of land, both landlord and tenant must recognize that the tenant has been given use of land belonging to the landlord in exchange for rent. As two contemporary commentators, John Stuart Mill and George Campbell, were to point out, however, Deasy's Act embodied concepts totally at odds with Irish rural life and, consequently, was an inappropriate piece of legislation when applied to Ireland. As a supporter of peasant proprietorship, Mill claimed that England was 'forcing [...] her own idea of absolute property in land' upon a country where 'it is not the right of the rent-receiver, but the right of the cultivator, with which the idea of property is connected.'9 George Campbell, who also emphasized the significance of land occupation in Ireland but contemplated the possibility of abandoning the concept of absolute property rights altogether in the Irish context, blamed the act on 'men of ultra-English ideas' who had failed to distinguish between Irish and English property relations.10 The relationship between landlord, tenant and land in England, according to Campbell, would not be reproduced in Ireland simply because a law designed to provide a legal framework for that relationship was applied there. The idea of property ownership contained in Deasy's Act, Campbell argued, reflected the realities of English property relations and was out of place in Ireland where property relations were quite different.

The concept of 'dual ownership' that was embodied in the provisions of the 1881 Land Act, and to a lesser degree in the provisions of the 1870 Land Act, suggested an understanding of rural Ireland that was closer to Campbell's analysis than it was to Mills.11 When introducing the land bill of 1870 to the Commons, Gladstone offered an interpretation of Irish property relations that would have been familiar to those members of his government who had read Campbell's The Irish land. Pointing out that in England and Scotland the idea

5 Ibid. 149. 6 See Carville, Coercive and constitutive, 12-20. 7 Bull. Land, property and nationalism, 44-5. 8 The Landlord and Tenant Law Amendment (Ireland) Act (1853): 18 & 19, 56, 6, 134. 9 Collins, Marxism and law, 24. 10 Engels, The origin of the family, private property and the state, 149.

11 Ibid. 11 Mil1, England and Ireland, 15. 12 Campbell, The Irish land, 165. 13 'Dual ownership' refers to the acceptance of the principles of the 'three Fs'—that is, fee tail of tenures and free sale.
of holding land by contract is perfectly traditional and familiar to the mind of every man". Gladstone argued that in Ireland where the old Irish ideas were never supplanted except by the rude hand of violence — by laws written on the statute book, but never entering into the heart of the Irish people — the people have not generally embraced the idea of the occupation of land by contract, and the old Irish notion that some interest in the soil adheres to the tenant, even though his contract has expired, is everywhere rooted in the popular mind.

The Land Acts of 1870 and 1881 recognized the rights of occupancy that the Irish tenant-farmer believed he/she had to the land; rights that were in contradiction to the absolute rights of ownership vested in landlordism under Deasy's Act. Consisting of a series of measures specifically designed to monitor the relationship between landlord and tenant, these later acts were feared by many to have fundamentally breached British conceptions of property law and rights. Under the 1881 Land Act, for example, rent was no longer fixed by the market but by special tribunals, the landlord's right to evict was restricted, and the tenant-farmer was allowed to sell his/her 'interest' in the holding. In reaction to this violation of property concepts, Conservative policy-makers, concerned that ambiguous property relations in Ireland could create a precedent that would unsettle concepts of property in England, Scotland and Wales, began to look to land purchase schemes as the only possible solution. The unacceptable interference with property that they believed had been enshrined in the 1881 Act had to be dismantled. If, in the Irish context, landlords could not hold absolute property rights, then ownership of the land would have to be transferred to the tenant-farmers who cultivated it. By the mid-1880s, key figures within the Conservative Party were convinced that the creation of a peasant proprietorship class was the sole means through which Irish property rights could be clarified. Consequently, it was the British political party that claimed to represent landlordism that set in motion a series of land purchase acts designed to bring about an inversion in landlord ownership in Ireland. Under the first of these acts, the Ashbourne Act of 1885, tenants could obtain loans for the full amount of the purchase price of their holdings, repayable in a period of forty-nine years by an annuity of 4 per cent per annum. These guidelines contrasted favourably to the purchase clauses contained in the 1881 Land Act that had required the tenant to raise a quarter of the purchase money on his/her own to be paid back in thirty-five years with an annual rate of 5 per cent. The 1881 Land Act was intended, therefore, to strongly appeal to tenant-farmers who might be considering buying the property they cultivated and, consequently, to speed the transfer of ownership of land in Ireland. The half a million acres that changed hands during its first three years of operation suggests that, in this regard, the act should be counted a success.

Irish land agitation, by compelling British governments first to rewrite the legal relationship between landlord and tenant, and then to initiate a substantial transformation in land ownership, proved to be an effective form of resistance against both the colonial state and the landlord class's monopolized control of the land, but its relationship to capitalism and modernity is not so clear. Depending on the economic frameworks used to conceptualize Irish history, this agitation could be interpreted as either a response to uncontrolled capitalist exploitation or the beginnings of a process through which a flawed feudalism was gradually replaced by agrarian capitalism. In Kevin Whelan's analysis, during the period of the nineteenth century Ireland underwent enormous changes and was rapidly transformed by colonial capitalism from a premodern society to an unstable mercantile capitalist modernity. In contrast, Eamonn Slater and Terry MacDonagh argue that the extraction of the peasant's surplus in the Irish context was determined not by the free play of the forces of a market economy, but by the extra-economic force of the landlord's standing in the local society and in the colonial polity. Slater and MacDonagh argue that Ireland was constitutionally integrated into England's capitalist economy, but they are keen to point out that the relationship between landlord and tenant, even after the Famine, was a relationship of dominance and subordination of the feudal type.

The work of the Indian subalternist historian, Partha Chatterjee, could provide the basis for an intervention into this debate on the economic status of Ireland in the nineteenth century. Forming a distinction between modes of production and modes of power, Chatterjee argues in More on modes of power that 'to be a producer in a sense that the peasant understands it is to participate in the surplus value of the capitalist.' In this sense, the peasant was creating surplus under the capitalist, but the relationship between landlord and tenant was one of domination. In a separate essay, Chatterjee argues that the clash between modes of power is particularly pronounced in colonized societies where the retarded form of capitalism that accompanies colonialism is often incapable of destroying pre-capitalist and, therefore, pre-colonialist forms. 20

15 Eamonn Slater and Terry MacDonagh. Landlordism and capitalism. 18 For a more in-depth analysis of Chatterjee's thesis, see page 168 below.

While Chatterjee’s thesis provides a useful alternative to the either/or approach adopted by Whelan and MacDonagh/Slater, the overly-simplistic equation of colonialism with capitalist modernity that forms the basis of this argument should be contested. As Joe Cleary points out, the ‘pre-eminently modernist’ process that transformed colonized societies was ‘accompanied by what would ultimately appear, from the perspective of a more fully developed industrial capitalism, with its “liberal” emphasis on free labour and free trade, to be apparent economic and legal-juridical “archaism”’. 21 It is not simply that colonial capitalism was, as Chatterjee has claimed, ‘retarded’ and ‘infirm’ and, consequently, unable to destroy pre-capitalist forms. 22 The dominant economic system that shaped colonialism may have been capitalism, but the slave plantations in the West Indies, the southern United States and Brazil; the hacienda and baríenda system in South America; and the oligarchic landed estates system in Ireland demonstrate that the basic productive relationships in all these situations continued to depend on overwhelmingly rural labour forces which were subjected to various modalities of coerced labour. 23 The subaltern or non-elite classes, whose experience of colonialism most commonly involved an encounter with these ‘archaism’, were unlikely, therefore, to have experienced colonialism purely in terms of capitalist modernity, ‘infirm’ or otherwise. The dynamics of colonialism as experienced in most colonies were not only distinct, but in some senses antithetical to a capitalist mode of production; the development of capitalism in Europe often relied upon a non-capitalist colonialism.

In his seminal article on Ireland, Cleary draws on the work of a number of influential Latin Americanist scholars who have likewise argued that the colonial process which served European capitalism frequently used as its instrument coercive practices most often associated with the feudal mode of production. Ernesto Laclau, for example, has traced Latin America’s ‘underdevelopment’ not only to the extraction of its economic surpluses by colonial powers, but to the imposition by such powers of a feudal socioeconomic structure that fixed ‘relations of production in an archaic mould of extra-economic coercion’. 24 To pose a choice between a feudal and a capitalist mode of production when describing economic practices within colonies can, however, be a problematic exercise. As Steve Stern points out in Feudalism, capitalism, and the world-system in the perspective of Latin America and the Caribbean, to seek to interpret the economic history of colonies by reference to this choice can lead to circular debates: ‘One can emphasize some features to find “capitalism”, others to find “feudalism”. 25 Andre Gunder Frank, for example, argues that the Latin American economy has been capitalist since Cortes and Pizarro. In Frank’s analysis, the hacienda (baríenda in Brazil) was a capitalist enterprise which created for itself the institutions which permitted it to respond to increased demand in the world or national market by expanding the amount of its land, capital, and labor and to increase the supply of its products. 26 By contrast, in the work of other commentators, such as Laclau, the hacienda was a feudal system which served European capitalism, but blocked capitalist development within the colonies themselves. Laclau agrees with Andre Gunder Frank that the so-called ‘backward’ regions of Latin America were inserted into an economic system that was as a whole capitalist, but such regions, he argues, are best categorized as feudal.

For Steve Stern, neither the feudal nor the capitalist economic category suffices in the colonial context. To refer to colonized Latin America as ‘capitalist’, according to Stern, is to obscure fundamental differences between the contemporary and the colonial economy, while to describe it as ‘feudal’ is to suggest quite wrongly in Stern’s opinion, that the dynamics of labour relations, subsistence and markets, and technology in Latin America under colonial rule can be equated with the conditions that existed in precapitalist Europe. 27 The solution to this dilemma, Stern suggests, is not an approach which seeks to discover whether a particular colony had more capitalist or precapitalist/non-capitalist elements, but one that acknowledges the colonial economy as a complex articulation of various modes of production. Indeed, Stern concludes this essay by arguing that it may be the very lack of a ‘consolidated’ mode of production in the usual sense that is the most important characteristic of colonial economic life. 28

It was, perhaps, the absence of a fully constituted mode of production (or the presence of what might best be described as a colonial mode of production) that allowed for the diverse nature of resistance to both landlordism and the colonial state in nineteenth-century Ireland and the often contradictory aims that this resistance encapsulated. For many commentators in late nine-tenth-century Ireland, landlordism had to be dismantled as it injurious to the economic condition of rural Ireland and one of the main impediments to capitalist development in the country as a whole. In his influential Open letter, Captain John Shawe-Taylor, the son of a Co. Galway landlord, argued that for the last two hundred years the land war in this country has raged fiercely and continuously bearing in its train stagnation of trade, paralysis of commercial business and enterprise, and producing hatred and bitterness between the various sections and classes of the community. In the terms of such an approach, the settlement of the land question would promote a union of classes for the furtherance of trade and enterprise and, consequently, was a necessary precondition for Ireland's metamorphosis into a modern capitalist nation.

---

Michael Davitt, hostile to a landlord system he associated with feudalism and colonialism, sought a viable alternative to both a unionism intent on integrating Ireland more fully into the British capitalist economy and an anti-colonial nationalism that sought to reproduce the conditions of that economy on Irish soil. While accusing landlordism of 'impeding the march of progress', Davitt made it clear that, in his opinion, the direction this march should take was substantially different to that envisaged by John Shawe-Taylor and others. At the first Land League convention, Davitt read from a document which he claimed embodied the principles and rules of this new association. Landlordism, according to Davitt, was a 'feudal idea' that 'came in with the conquest'. Associated with foreign dominion it 'has never to this day been recognized by the moral sentiments of the people'. Consequently, 'for the protection of the propertied rights of a few thousand landlords in the country, a standing army of semi-military police is maintained.' Davitt's analysis, the landlord system as it operated in nineteenth-century Ireland was most accurately categorized as feudal, but he was also keen to point out that this feudal system had been imposed through conquest and, consequently, was quite distinct to feudalism as it had been experienced in England. For Davitt, therefore, it was not feudalism as such, but a particularly distorted version of feudalism that had been so damaging to the country and its inhabitants.

In The fall of landlordism in Ireland, Davitt provided the following assessment of Irish landlordism. Property has its duties under the feudal system of tenure, as well as its rights, but in Ireland those enjoying the monopoly of the land have only considered that they had rights, and have always been forgetful of their duties. The 'march of progress' that Davitt spoke of would not simply replace this flawed feudalism with rural capitalism, but would look to interpret an agrarian radicalism in the context of Ireland's experience of colonialism. Reiterating John Stuart Mill's belief that before the conquest, the Irish people knew nothing of absolute property in land, Davitt argued that it was possible to find substantial traces of communal land ownership in contemporary rural practices. It was these traces that would form the basis of a system of land nationalization capable of providing an alternative to both feudal and capitalist concepts of property. The application of the notion of a 'march of progress' to that of collective property rights implies that, for Davitt, it was not simply a matter of turning back the clock. In Davitt's analysis, an older concept of land ownership still existed in a contemporary form and could be merged with a radical politics to allow for the creation of a fairer land system. Davitt's version of land nationalization is, therefore, a precursor to the concept of Gaelic communism that can be found in the writings of James Connolly.

Though often dismissed as little more than an interesting oddity of the Land War period, the idea of land nationalization espoused by Davitt and the American agrarian radical, Henry George, received a significant degree of support from sectors within the land movement and the poorer members of the rural community, particularly the agricultural labourers. Land nationalization, though never officially endorsed by the Land League, was accepted by central figures within the League such as John Ferguson, Thomas Brennan, the Reverend Harold Rylett and by the newspapers Irish World, Brotherhood and the Belfast Weekly Star as the most appropriate solution to the Irish land question. Politicians within the British Conservative party were supported, however, by mainstream Irish nationalists and the more affluent tenant-farmers in their introduction of a series of land acts specifically designed to 'normalize' the ownership of land in Ireland from the capitalist perspective. While poorer members of the rural community and social radicals like Davitt had ensured that the question of the land remained the key political issue of the 1880s, it was the conservative elements that determined the final outcome of the land transfers.

Davitt's reaction to this reshuffling of property rights is best categorized by its ambiguity. For Davitt, the land forces were emancipatory to the extent that they brought to an end a system of semi-feudal landlordism introduced by colonialism into Ireland. In this context, Davitt could describe these acts as the greatest achievements of 'an Irish movement which sprang without leaders from the peasantry of the country'. In April 1884, however, Davitt published an article in the British socialist monthly Today in which he outlined what he anticipated would be the negative effects of land reform as it was being enacted in Ireland: 'Peasant proprietor will not destroy, it will only extend the absolute ownership of land, an ownership which will always be in the market for purchase and recon­solidation into larger estates' (Davitt's emphasis). Davitt's analysis of Irish land transfers, which could conceive of this transformation in land ownership as simultaneously emancipatory and oppressive is, in my opinion, one of the more insightful commentaries on this crucial period in Ireland's economic and political history. As a nationalist, Davitt could refer to the 'revolution' that was 'the repossession of the soil of the country'. His interest in the fate of the rural poor ensured, however, that this nationalist assertion of victory was accompanied by a questioning as to what form this repossession would take. Land reform, according to Davitt, would be of benefit to the poorer rural dwellers in that it would abolish an oppressive system of landlordism. He was also to state his belief, however, that the particular form the land acts had taken would allow for new forms of oppression. These two reactions to Irish land reform might seem to be in conflict, but I would argue that they are complementary as opposed to contradictory. Davitt was one of a small number of participants in the elite political domain in Ireland during this period who could celebrate what he interpreted to be the return of the soil to the Irish people and then question which group or class of Irish people was being referred to.

In the period between the enactment of the land purchase acts of the 1880s and the establishment of the Irish Free State in 1922, an immense transformation in landownership dramatically transformed rural Ireland. A survey of estates in the 1870s demonstrated that over half the country was owned by less than a thousand landlords. Nine million acres of this land was transferred to the occupiers under the 1903 and 1905 Land Acts. The landlord class may, as Lionel Pilkington has recently argued, have sought and continued to be assigned privileged status, but, by the time the Wyndham Act was passed in 1903, landlordism as an institution was no longer a dominant force. In Latin America, by contrast, the landed system founded in the colonial encounter between Spaniards and indigenous populations remained in place after independence and still persists in many regions to-day. Indeed, as pointed out by Gerrit Huizer, 'after the end of the colonial epoch, the local white or mestizo elite in most of the Latin American countries expanded its wealth and power in an aggressive way, mainly at the cost of the indigenous peasants'. When taking into consideration the demands of the rural poor in Latin America and, of late, in Zimbabwe for measures capable of bringing about a similar transfer in landownership, it is difficult to dispute Davitt's claim in The fall of feudalism in Ireland that what occurred in Ireland around the turn of the twentieth century constituted a revolution.

As Davitt predicted would be the case; however, peasant proprietory, by reinstating absolute rights of ownership, allowed for the emergence of a new dominant class, the large farmers eager to add to their already substantial holdings whom George Bernard Shaw, an advocate of land nationalization, was to satirize in John Bull's other island. The poorer tenant-farmer might be in the process of buying out his/her small holding as the result of a land purchase act, but owning this piece of ground would not make it any more profitable. Concerned primarily with land purchase as opposed to land redistribution, the land acts had little to offer smallholders or landless agricultural labourers. In Shaw's play, discussion of further reform that might correct this situation is dismissed by those who have benefited most from land purchase acts as 'blatherumskite'. Cornelius Doyle, a former land agent who has adopted the role of spokesperson for this emerging farmer class, explains to his son that 'every man cant own land; and some men must own it to employ them'. Critical of a local nationalist politician who 'doesn't know where to stop', Doyle proclaims that 'round about here, we got the land at last; and we want no more Government meddling.'

The establishment of the Congested Districts Board by Arthur Balfour in 1881 was a tacit acknowledgement that, notwithstanding claims to the contrary, the land question was far from solved. Charged with relieving congestion on land in the west of the country where the land acts had done little to improve the conditions of those who held small 'uneconomic' holdings or no land at all, the Board put in force the programme of land redistribution so feared by Shaw's prosperous farmers. The Congested Districts Board, however, could only redistribute land that landlords and farmers were willing to sell to it and this was a small fraction of the total land affected by the acts. Consequently, its redistribution programme was a mere partial solution to the problem of land hunger, as was recognized by members of the Meath County Council who in 1906 proposed calling on the government to amend the Land Act of 1903 by having a clause inserted providing for compulsory sale of all untenanted land in Ireland.

---

18 See Shaw's prosperous farmers. The Congested Districts Board, however, could only redistribute land that landlords and farmers were willing to sell to it and this was a small fraction of the total land affected by the acts. Consequently, its redistribution programme was a mere partial solution to the problem of land hunger, as was recognized by members of the Meath County Council who in 1906 proposed calling on the government to amend the Land Act of 1903 by having a clause inserted providing for compulsory sale of all untenanted land in Ireland.
through the Estates Commissioners for distribution amongst the farmers’ sons, labourers and artisans, and evicted tenants of the country.49

This proposal was perhaps motivated by the knowledge that the many small-holders and landless labourers who were unable to benefit from the Board’s limited redistribution programme found that the untenanted pastures to which they had previously enjoyed rights of common grazing (sometimes referred to as agistment) were in the hands of graziers.49

The vast majority of emigrants in the final years of the nineteenth century and the early twentieth century were the rural poor who had shaped the modes of resistance that dominated the Land War. For the landless labourers, this period was, as Angela Bourke has pointed out, ‘particularly difficult […] leading to more emigration than at any time since the period immediately after the Famine’.50 Their departure allowed those who had gained most from the land acts, the large and medium farmers, to consolidate their economic and political power. It was the concerns of this latter group that dominated Irish rural politics in the years leading up to the establishment of the Free State. Further land reform might have curtailed emigration, but as it was not to the advantage of the substantial farmer, it failed to attain the full endorsement of the nationalist politicians who were keen to gain the support of this important constituency. In John Bull’s other island, Matthew Haffigan and Barney Doran, recent additions to the ranks of the middling farmer, were reassured by a potential nationalist candidate that his talk of reform is mere empty rhetoric.

MATTHEW [with suspicion] Haffigan, does reform manne, sir? Does it manne atherin anythin dhat as it is now?

BROADBENT [impressively] It means, Mr Haffigan, maintaining those reforms which have already been conferred on humanity by the Liberal Party, and trusting for future developments to the free activity of a free people on the basis of those reforms.

DORAN. Dhat’s right. No more meddlin. We’re all right now; all we want is to be left alone.51

In the early twentieth century, emigration functioned as an effective safety valve that drained the country of its most dissatisfied elements.52 Nevertheless, there were many remaining in Ireland who had good reason to believe that the land struggle was far from over. Tensions between the farming class depicted by Shaw and poorer rural inhabitants led to repeated outbreaks of agrarian agitation. The extent to which the desires of this discontented sector of the rural population were to diverge from that of the nationalist leadership became apparent in 1920 when an alternative legal system was established under the First Dail to protect large farmers from land seizures and agrarian ‘outrages’.

In the immediate aftermath of the Wyndham Act of 1903, the focus of rural tensions was the nonresidential graziers or ranchers who held land in the grazing areas of the country under the eleven-month system. Under this system, the grazier secured the use of the land for only eleven months, after which the land was once again put up for auction. From the landlord’s perspective, the benefit of the eleven-month system was that the holder of the land could not claim formal tenancy or legal interest and, consequently, could be dispossessed without notice to quit or expensive litigation. Furthermore, the rents of eleven-month land were generally higher than those of tenanted land as they were outside the jurisdiction of the tribunals established under the 1881 Land Act. For the shopkeeper or publican with surplus capital looking for a quick profit, the eleven-month system offered maximum flexibility. Ultimately, this system of farming which, as David S. Jones points out, ‘had little in common with peasant agriculture’, involved the grazing of dry cattle and sheep over a large expanse of pasture for short periods.53 When touring in Connacht in 1908, the constitutional nationalist Stephen Gwynn voiced his concern over the shopkeeper-grazier who ‘takes up land for stock-farming in a country where hardly any cottier or tillage farmer has a holding fit to live on’.54 Two years previously, an editorial in the Irish Times commenting on the failure of the redistribution clause of the 1903 Land Act in the parts of the country where it was most required, spoke of the existence over a large portion of the west of Ireland […] of holdings which are insufficient in either size or fertility, or both, to support a family in comfort.55 The antigrazier agitation of 1906–9, commonly referred to as the ‘Ranch War’, was most prevalent in those parts of Connacht, North and East Leinster and North Munster where large grazing farms were established alongside such small ‘uneconomic’ holdings.

The shift in attention from landlords during the Land War to ranchers during this later confrontation did not, however, require a new or even revised agrarian code. The ‘unwritten law’ that had sanctioned the Land War was also to legitimize the campaign against the ranchers. Grazing farms, the majority of which had been set up in the latter half of the nineteenth century, were reliant upon two main sources of land: unencumbered land and evicted holdings. In his analysis of the campaign against the graziers, David S. Jones tells us that in the aftermath of the Famine, evicted land formerly held by subsistence tenants was consolidated into large pastoral holdings and rented to graziers and other men of capital. To the owners and occupiers of small plots of land close to large grazing farms, these grasslands were the homes of evicted tenants. A report that appeared in the Irish Times on 11 November 1906 told of a 'large assemblage' that had gathered in Co. Roscommon in response to a placard which formed a direct link between evicted tenants and grazing farms:

Men of Kilbride, come in your thousands on Sunday [...] and show by your presence and determination that you are prepared to support the claims of the several evicted tenants of Roadborough lands that no grazier will, with honour and security to himself, lay claim to the lands from which your fathers and their predecessors were ruthlessly evicted without knowing that a united, determined, and a never flinching people are prepared at any sacrifice to have the lands which were theirs before cramping a heap of foreign origin, or manufactured licks-pit, or heelers of our own ancestry learned how to sell Ireland and Erin's children.

It was this connection between ranching and eviction that allowed ranchers to be branded as 'landgrabbers' and dealt with accordingly under the agrarian code. That these 'landgrabbers' lived at some distance from their holdings further inflamed a rural population who had so strenuously asserted rights of occupancy.

As the same criteria that had been the means of distinguishing between acceptable and unacceptable behaviour during the Land War was used to condemn the ranchers, the tactics applied against landlords and 'landgrabbers' in the 1880s could be employed in the Ranch War twenty years later. In May 1906, the Irish Times triumphantly declared that the death of Michael Davitt closes a chapter in Irish history. The stormy and sinister events in which he played so large a part are no more than an unhappy memory to the generation which had grown up since the camp for a week in the cottage of one of the marked graziers. He will then realize all the joys of an enforced isolation—save for the company of his grazier friend and a few stalwart policemen. If he wants to get provisions to stave off the pangs of hunger, it will tax his wits to know where to get them. If he determines to get them at Dromahair, and starts to walk to that village of detached residences, there will immediately start out from behind some Hawthorn bush or sloe tree, by the roadside, a couple of the very vigilant Vigilance Committee, and they will dog him to whatever shop he proposes to enter. If the shopkeeper is so foolhardy as to sell him anything, in comes the vigilance gentlemen before the goods are off the counter, and the shopkeeper is forced to cancel his purchase and sale, and take back his goods.66

---

The chief secretary was also invited to set up incognito a general store in Dromahair or Drumkeerin so that he could see for himself the results of serving a boycotted grazier. According to the reporter, he would soon learn what it was like to be a marked man in the community, one whose breath and whose touch are to be regarded as contaminating and to have his flour 'turn mushy on the shelf', his land 'remain on his hands until it rots', and his preserved meat 'well tested by time'.67

Newspaper coverage also points to the role that anti-hunting agitation played in the Ranch War. Towards the end of 1906, an article published in the Irish Times told of a series of incidences that had led to the temporary suspension of the Duhallow Hunt:

In consequence of four hounds belonging to the Duhallow Hunt having been poisoned on the public road during the past fortnight, the Master, Mr Baring, has given notice to the members of the hunt that the hounds will not meet for the present.68

In October 1908, a number of newspapers, including the Nenagh News and Tipperary Vindication, reported in detail on an event that had taken place on the opening day of an annual fox hunt in Co. Tipperary. Members of the Ormonde hunting fraternity were gathering for refreshments on the lawn of a house belonging to a local substantial farmer, when a crowd estimated at 2000 forced the gate of the layway and, hanging on broken beer bottles, demanded that the hunt expel two boycotted graziers, Albert and Henry Rawlinson, from its

of 1908. The ceremonial aspect of this form of rural protest was emphasized in the description of cattle driving that the cinema trade journal Bioscope provided along with its synopsis of the film for the British cinema trade:

The tenants, banded together in a league, decide on concerted action, and, on a prearranged signal, collect together, and drive off the grazier's cattle to some remote spot. Usually, as in the case depicted, the occasion is taken advantage of for a general demonstration, in which the local drum and fife bands, as well as the women, dressed in their best, join.24

While the Ranch War is generally acknowledged to have come to an end around 1909, rural agitation resurfaced intermittently right up until and after the establishment of the Free State, culminating in the 'agrarian bolshevism' or land seizures of 1919 and 1920.25 Kevin O'Shiel, a young barrister, was approached by the First Dáil at this time and asked to investigate an outbreak of agrarian violence in the west. The intensity of this agitation is demonstrated by the officially returned 'agrarian outrages' which were higher in 1920 than in any year since 1882.26 In a series of articles that appeared in the Irish Times in 1909, O'Shiel recalled a group of men who marched through Connacht in 1909 brandishing cattle with the initials S.P. [Sinn Féin] and hanging the tricolour over confiscated land.27 O'Shiel was to comment in particular on the 'aggressive Bolshie' spirit of the agitators he encountered in Co. Roscommon.28 Gearóid Ó Tuathail, a more recent commentator, has outlined why the seizure of land was particularly prevalent in that part of Connacht. Small farmers and landless labourers in Co. Roscommon. Ó Tuathail explains, were not simply concerned with the long-term issue of land redistribution; more immediately they required access to commons land for survival.29 As early as 1917, two years before land seizures were occurring on a regular basis in other western counties, estates were invaded in Arigna, Warren, Mockneyne and Tim Secartha 'by hundreds of small farmers, lightly armed with shot and an occasional pitchfork'. Land seizures as carried

---

24 Bioscope (24 Dec. 1908). Many thanks to Denis Conlon for drawing my attention to this piece. 25 An editorial entitled 'Agrarian Bolshevism' that appeared in the Irish Times on 26 April 1910 referred to small farmers and landless peasants in the west who were 'sowing landholders, including the Congested Districts Board, to surrender property. The following month, landowners were advised by that unionist newspaper that the only way to put a stop to land seizures was to 'abolish some sort of control over the Sinn Féin movement', Labour and the Land. (5 May 1910). 26 See Fitzpatrick, Class, family and rural society in nineteenth-century Ireland, 71-72; O'Shiel, 'The Dáil land courts: a controversial issue', Irish Times (4 Nov. 1909); The Dáil land courts; Irish Times (12 Nov. 1909); 'Of the state and the land', Irish Times (21 Nov. 1909). 27 O'Shiel, 'The Dáil land courts: a controversial issue', Irish Times (4 Nov. 1909). 28 See O'Shiel, 'The Dáil land courts: a controversial issue', Irish Times (4 Nov. 1909). 29 See O'Shiel, 'The Dáil land courts: a controversial issue', Irish Times (4 Nov. 1909).
based primarily in Connacht and Munster; by 1900 the organization had branches throughout Ireland. Unlike the Land League and National League, the United Irish League was focused firmly on the grazing issue, advocating the compulsory expropriation of ranchers and the redistribution of their grasslands:

The most effective means of preventing the frequent cries of distress and famine in the so-called congested districts would be the breaking up of the large grazing ranches with which the district is cursed and the partition of them amongst the smallholders who were driven into the bogs and mountains.\(^{85}\)

The United Irish League can be compared to its predecessors in that it took on a de facto governmental role, distributing funds to those in economic distress, and establishing an alternative court system that can parallel to and sometimes threatened to supplant official law. Between October 1899 and October 1900, over 120 cases, including a number for contempt of court, were brought before United Irish League branches.\(^{86}\) At the height of the Ranch War, a report that appeared in the Irish Times claimed that in Co. Leitrim the United Irish League's law is the law of the country; its courts are the only courts which are seriously heeded. By them, the grazier, the farmer, the shopkeeper, are bidden to come and appear, or else subject themselves to the full penalty of the League law. The police are laughed at as the instruments of an effete, an abrogated law.\(^{87}\)

Commenting on the situation in Co. Leitrim, the editor of the Irish Times was in a later edition to clarify what the "full penalty of the League law" entailed in such cases. If the summoned grazier, farmer or shopkeeper neglects to attend, or refuses to obey the behests of the self-appointed tribunal, a rigorous boycott ensures [...] Horn blowing and drumming parties frequent the neighbourhood of his house, and at every turn he is reminded of his offence against the law of the League.\(^{88}\)

As was the case with the League courts that operated in the 1880s, this later court system was closely affiliated with the agrarian code, imposing its most severe penalties on "landgrabbers" and those who associated with them. In October 1888, for example, the father of a labourer was called before a United Irish League branch to answer the charge that his son was employed by a boy-cotted grazier.\(^{89}\)

In 1899, elections held under the new Local Government Act allowed the United Irish League to take control of most of the district and county councils in the areas in which it had already established branches. The initial primary concern of the League - to form an alliance with the rural poor who had gained least from the land acts - was increasingly overshadowed by a strategy designed to bring about an even greater degree of de facto self-government. The first National Convention of the United Irish League in 1900 was, as Philip Bull tells us, "commonly referred to as the 'Parliament of the Irish People'."\(^{90}\) More importantly, at least in terms of this study, in the towns where the United Irish League had gained control of the county councils, the Irish flag was flown over official courthouses.\(^{91}\) Changing the flag on these buildings had little effect, however, on the proceedings that went on within their walls. Indeed, this practice functioned primarily to legitimize a legal system which throughout the nineteenth century had attempted to legislate against the unwritten law that had formed the basis of most alternative legal structures in Ireland.

Towards the end of 1910, the First Dáil was approached by a deputation of substantial farmers from Connacht. The targets of land seizures and cattle drives, they had previously sought help from the RIC but had been informed that the police had neither the time nor the manpower to protect their land and animals. Kevin O'Shiel was one of the men dispatched to assess the situation in the west and report back to the Dáil. When those who were marching through Connacht under the tricolour were told by O'Shiel that the TDs who were sitting as Dáil Éireann were not in favour of land seizures, they removed the orange and white from their flags and marched instead under the green flag of the Ancient Order of Hibernians.\(^{92}\) The courts established under the First Dáil sought to dispel the concerns of substantial farmers by putting a stop to such behaviour.

The Dáil courts of 1912-4 (also known as the republican courts) were an integral component in what had become one of the central strategies of Irish anti-colonial resistance: the displacement of 'British' political and administrative institutions by de facto alternatives. Following the success of Sinn Féin in the 1918 General Election, this tactic was to culminate in abstention from Westminster with seceding MPs becoming TDs in an independent legislative assembly, Dáil Éireann. The subsequent takeover of local government was to complete this act of political dispossession.69 In 1920, the Irish unionist Lord Dunraven wrote to the Times attesting to the achievements of the newly established separatist administration:

---

85--88 See Ball, Land, politics and nationalism. 89--90 See Ball, L. (1984), A fiscal dispensation. 91--92 See Kavanagh, Return from revolution, 26.

An illegal government has become the de facto government. Its jurisdiction is recognised. It administers justice promptly and equitably and we are in this curious dilemma that the civil administration of the country is carried on under a system the existence of which the de facto government does not and cannot acknowledge and is carried on very well.70

The judicial system that operated under the First Dáil was created for the purpose of displacement. As Mary Kotsonouris points out in her in-depth analysis of this subversive legal system, it was the stated policy of Sinn Féin that its own courts were to be used exclusively and that it would have been seen as an act of patriotism to shun those operated by the "enemy."71 In 1921, Austin Stack, Minister for Home Affairs under the Dáil administration, informed the District Court registrars that any person who takes part in proceedings in an enemy court either as plaintiff, defendant, witness or otherwise, unless with a special written permission of the minister for home affairs, will be deemed guilty of assisting the enemy in time of war and will be dealt with accordingly.72

Indeed, it was relatively common practice at this time for those who were being tried under official law to seek an injunction in a Dáil court to restrain the plaintiff from implementing him/her in a foreign court.73

A functioning court system needs a building in which to proceed and a police force to implement its rulings. In the early 1920s, crown courts in Ireland were often denied these basic requirements. Most local authorities declared their allegiance to Dáil Éireann and its republican courts, and attempted to prevent crown court sittings by locking and bolting the doors of courthouses in their areas.74 Courthouses were also frequently the target of arson attacks, prompting the British government to pass legislation authorizing the use of alternative venues for the holding of courts. During the winter of 1919-20, repeated raids had forced the RIC to evacuate many of their rural barracks. In the first six months of 1920, 424 of these abandoned barracks and a further 16 occupied ones were destroyed.75 In these districts the only effective police force was the republican one and, as has been pointed out by James Casey, 'it was scarcely to be expected that they would enforce what they would have considered as enemy decrees.'76 In 1922, the magistrate at Collon was to inform the Under-Secretary that the republican courts function everywhere and do all the work, civil and criminal. There are no RIC to bring cases to my courts, and if any civil cases were brought, there is no body to execute our warrants or enforce our decrees.77

With the exceptions of the north-east of the country, where Dáil courts rarely won the kind of popular acceptance that their day-to-day running required, and certain divisions of the high court in Dublin, established law was all but defunct by the time the Anglo-Irish Treaty had been signed.

Those involved in founding the Dáil courts in 1920 may not have approved of the operations of official law in Ireland, but this network of subversive tribunals adopted the structures of official law and was often only alternative to the extent that it allowed the Irish populace to take their legal proceedings to an Irish as opposed to a 'British' court. Conor A. Maguire, one of a number of lawyers who chose to work within this 'illegal' court structure, proudly informs us that 'except for the absence of judicial robes, the courts were carried on exactly as were our opposite numbers of the established British system.'78 In his account of the operations of these tribunals, Maguire makes it clear that the supreme court, district courts and parish courts brought into existence by decree of Dáil Éireann were designed to correspond, respectively, to the high court, county courts and petty sessions they were supplanting.4 In Retreat from revolution, Mary Kotsonouris aptly describes the Dáil courts as follows:

apart from the act of defiance constituted by their very existence, there was nothing of a revolutionary court in the way business was conducted.

69 In the municipal elections of January 1920, Sinn Féin gained control of 82 out of 127 town councils. In the rural elections that took place in the following May, Republican majorities were returned as 78 out of 117 county councils and 32 out of 206 rural councils. See Townsend, The British campaign in Ireland, 1919-1921, 27-8. 70 Cited in "Lord Dunraven's tribute to Sinn Fein courts," Irish Leader (2 July 1920). 71 Kotsonouris, Retreat from revolution, 96. 72 Scheme of Republican courts and detailed instructions sent by Austin Stack to district court registrars in mid-September 1921, 96. 73 See Casey, 'Republican courts in Ireland,' 139. 74 Ibid. 75 The civil jurisdiction of the courts of justice of the Irish Republic, 1919-1921, 123. 76 See O'Conchubhair, Law in Ireland, 1919-1921, 59. 77 Kotsonouris, Retreat from revolution, 117. 78 Ibid., 5. 79 O'Sullivan, 'Years of violence', Irish Times (15 Nov. 1985).
Subversive law in Ireland, 1879–1920

or in the run of decisions. In harmony with most legal systems of the time and of long after, they were primarily concerned with the protection of property rather than the well-being of persons. No order, social or procedural, was overturned.

Dáil courts, Kotsonouris concludes, were ‘extraordinary courts that operated in an ordinary way’. Mimicking the proceedings and procedures of official courts (though not to the same extent as the legal system established for the Irish Free State), for the most part they adopted the ethos and value-system of the legal institutions they displaced.

The Dáil courts not only displaced the official court system, they also supplanted or brought under direct control of the Dáil the subversive tribunals that were operating throughout much of Ireland at this time. The first of the Dáil courts sat at Ballinrobe, Co. Mayo, in May 1920 to pass judgement on a case involving the seizure of land. Upon learning that judgement had been in favour of the landowners, the claimants, who ranged from a landless labourer to an eight-acre congest, were heard to announce that this was ‘no Sinn Féin court’ and that it was ‘worse than the British’. To enforce the judgement, an IRA unit was brought in to forcibly remove the claimants from the land in question and detain them on an island in Lough Corrib. A month later, the Dáil issued the following decree:

That the present time when the Irish people are locked in a life and death struggle with their traditional enemy, is ill chosen for the stiring up of strife amongst our fellow countrymen; and that all our energies must be directed towards the clearing out — not the occupiers of this or that piece of land — but the foreign invader of our country.

Acknowledging that in many cases claimants or their ancestors had previously been in occupation of the property under dispute, it was nevertheless stated that pending the international recognition of the Republic no claims of the kind referred to shall be heard or determined by the courts of the Republic unless by written licence of the Minister for Home Affairs. Any person who persisted in asserting his/her right to these properties was doing so in the knowledge that such action is a breach of this decree and it is ordered that the forces of the Republic be used to protect the citizens against the adoption of high handed methods. ‘British’ courts were essentially defunct at this time, but rural Ireland was still subject to clashing systems of control. It was now, however, the subversive court system established by Irish anti-colonial nationalists which was legislating against ‘unwritten law’ and protecting the property rights of those who under this law were categorized as ‘landgrabbers’.

The mixed loyalties that were to result from this clash are perhaps best demonstrated with reference to two men who were detained on an island off the Clare coast for three weeks following their refusal to obey a Dáil court decree that had ordered them to rebuild a demolished field wall on contested land. When a number of RIC arrived by boat to rescue the ‘prisoners’, they were pelted with stones and told to return to the mainland. The police, having been informed by the ‘prisoners’ that they had no authority over the affairs of citizens of the Irish Republic, withdrew, leaving the men to finish their sentence. As is evidenced by their words and actions, political independence of the kind that Dáil Éireann represented was not an irrelevancy to these men, but neither were they willing to accept a judgement which suggested that their material needs were less important than the ‘need’ of the first Dáil to obtain the support of ‘men of substance’.

Law was a crucial arena for the struggles that arose from the colonial relationship of England and Ireland. Official law was one of the main mediums for the implementation of English rule and, consequently, played an integral role in the colonization process, while throughout the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries the concept of an alternative system of law capable of supplanting a despised official legal system was a fundamental component of Irish anti-colonial resistance. Subversive law in the form of boycotting, ‘unwritten law’, Repeal Association arbitration courts, Ribbon Association courts, Land League courts, National League courts and United Irish League courts attempted to fill a gap created by an official system of law which rarely sought and never attained the kind of widespread support that its successful administration required. By the early 1920s, however, the concept of an alternative legality had culminated in the creation of a legal system that, like the ‘British’ courts it supplanted, was aligned with landowners and primarily concerned with the protection of private property. The radical nature of subversive law in the 1880s, by contrast, is to be located in its ability to attain de facto status while simultaneously challenging the bourgeois value-system that was the basis of both colonial law and the legal system that replaced it before and after the establishment of the Free State. It is resistance informed by a combination of social radicalism and subaltern discontent, therefore, which provides the greatest potential for genuine alternatives that are capable of doing more than simply replicating the dominant economic, political and cultural forms of that which is being resisted.

12 See ‘Good story from Clare’, Leinster Leader (10 June 1920).

CHAPTER FIVE

Theories of resistance: an analysis

Since the early 1980s, the most sustained analysis of the concept of resistance and the role of the subaltern or non-elite colonized subject has come from key theorists of a school within Indian historiography—the group of postcolonial scholars who go by the title of the Subaltern Studies collective. As this book, like the work of the subalternist historians, sets out to examine issues of resistance, revolution and subalternity in a colonial/postcolonial context, I will conclude my study by situating my work in relation to the writings of these influential figures. This chapter offers an overview of the trajectory (or variant trajectories) of the Subaltern Studies project, analyzing the extent to which this important body of work has both enhanced and, particularly in its poststructuralist incarnations, constricted notions of resistance and subalternity. In the light of an examination of the damaging implications of these constrictions and through a critique of David Lloyd’s application of a Subaltern Studies approach to Ireland, in the final chapter of this book I will construct an alternative framework through which issues of resistance and subalternity can be explored. The benefits of this framework are twofold: first, it is designed to recuperate the emancipatory potential evident in the writings of earlier anti-colonial theorists of subalternity and resistance, and, second, it is more appropriate to Ireland’s experience of settler colonialism.

The need to address the work of the Subaltern Studies collective and David Lloyd, the Irish cultural theorist who is most influenced by this body of work, is at least in part due to the manifold success of this group in breaking down the notion of a hegemonized, monolithic culture and radically reshaping concepts of power and resistance. From the start the project has been a self-confessed revisionist one, rejecting what is described as elite historiography. This charge of elitism refers not only to colonialist, but also to anti-colonial nationalist and economistic Marxist versions of historical events. In response to those ‘conditioned to write the history of a peasant revolt as if it were some other history — that of the Raj, or of Indian nationalism, or of socialism’, Ranajit Guha, the founder member of the group, asked for the subaltern/insurgent to be reinterpreted as the ‘subject of his own history’ and ‘the maker of his own rebellion’. The motivation behind the rejection of anti-colonial nationalist histortography, for example, is the claim that this branch of history writing is structured within the framework of a national/imperial opposition outside of which nothing else matters and within which only certain sectors of the native population are represented. Included in the category of those believed to be excluded under this framework are the urban poor, ethnic minorities, sexual minorities and, perhaps most importantly, the peasantry. In its earliest manifestations, and particularly in the work of Ranajit Guha, the Subaltern Studies project sought to 'restore' the suppressed histories of subaltern groups unrepresented by conventional narratives of the nation.3

This project of recovery has led to a decolonizing of familiar notions of power and the political. Without such a decolonizing, Partha Chatterjee and other members of the collective have argued, it is possible to undertake an extensive study of the struggles of the subaltern classes and still maintain an 'elite' bias. This failure is evident, according to Chatterjee, in the writings of nationalist and Marxist historians who focus exclusively on subaltern actions that affect the 'structures of organised politics relating to the sphere of the state'.4 For the Subaltern Studies collective, a narrow notion of politics centred on the domain of the elite either condemns the subaltern classes to political insignificance or acts as an artificial filter, only remaining for examination those events and actions that are judged to be 'historically significant'. If the subaltern is to be reinterpreted as a political subject, the political arena has to be extended outside the structures of the state. Consequently, in an introductory essay to Selected Subaltern Studies, Guha urges that the subaltern classes be thought of as belonging to an 'autonomous domain' of Indian politics connected to, but nonetheless resolutely distinct from, the elite domain of nationalist politics (Guha's emphasis).4

In Ranajit Guha's early theorization of the Subaltern Studies project, the Indian Marxist Antonio Gramsci is invoked as an authority for the group. Even in the early work of the Subaltern Studies collective, however, the terms 'subaltern' and 'subaltern autonomy', taken from Gramsci's Prison notebooks, were defined and handled in ways that often departed from Gramsci's own usages. Like the members of the collective, Gramsci asserted the autonomous nature of subaltern groups, but he was also keen to demonstrate the extent to which these groups were implicated in wider socio-economic relations. As Achin Vanaik points out, 'Gramsci gave variant meanings to the notion of “subaltern autonomy”, emphasizing interpenetration between elites and subalterns in contrast to the Subaltern Studies group’s increasing emphasis on the distinctive

---

3 The representation aspect of this project has received some criticism, most notably from Gayatri Spivak in Can the subaltern speak?. In this essay, Spivak questions the possibility of recovering a subaltern voice that is not some kind of centrist fiction. 4 Chatterjee, Peasant, politics and historiography: a response. 5 Ranajit Guha, On some aspects of the historiography of colonial India. 6 S. O'Hanlon, *‘Foucauldian’ critique of the work of the collective in 1988 could, therefore, discern certain postmodernist elements in this work, but remained critical of what she defined as the group’s Marxist-humanist attachment to models of agency and intentionality. 7 Since the publication of Selected Subaltern Studies, there has, however, been a discernible shift in approach and subject matter. During the 1990s, Partha Chatterjee and Dipesh Chakrabarty emerged as pivotal theorists within the group, developing the poststructuralist slant already evident in the collective’s early engagements with ‘Foucauldian’ notions of power and dominance. Writing early in the decade, Chakrabarty was keen to point out that while subalternist historians were influenced by Gramsci, they are also receptive to the poststructuralist ‘credibility towards grand narratives’. Claiming that Marxist thought had not been completely rejected by the group, Chakrabarty nonetheless reminds the reader that Subaltern Studies was conceived within an explicit spirit of opposition to the elitist and teleological narratives that both Marxists and nationalist traditions—often working together in left-liberal writings—had promoted.
in Indian historiography. Guha's earlier reference to the "failure of the nation to come to its own" is cited by Chakrabarty when he warns us that even those working within the group can fall into the Marxist trap of interpreting Indian society within a damaging Eurocentric framework (Guha's emphasis). In The forms of Indian communism, Achin Vanati, citing Sumit Sarkar, a former member of the Subaltern Studies editorial team and a major critic from within the group of its more recent theoretical developments, describes this transition as a "fine line": Subaltern Studies has shifted from "Thompsonian social history" to "poststructuralist cultural studies" and Saidian critique of colonial discourse" — social history collapsing into cultural studies. According to Sarkar, the Subaltern Studies project has been stretched in a poststructuralist direction so that it can fit more easily into American academic-political culture. Talking into account Chakrabarty's claim that the subalternist historians' receptivity to poststructuralist ideas does not necessarily mean that members of the group understand themselves to be either simply or strictly poststructuralist, I believe that it is possible to trace the Subaltern Studies group's increasing methodological affiliations to French high theory, and, by focusing on ideas of resistance and marginality, to explore the consequences of this theoretical shift.

The most obvious point of contrast between the writings of the Marxist Antonio Gramsci and Michel Foucault, a formative figure within poststructuralist thought, is to be found in their analyses of resistance and, in particular, in their interpretations of the relationship that exists between resistance and the dominant. In Discipline and punish, Foucault defines disciplinary power as "the non-reversible subordination of one group of people by another" (my emphasis), while in Language, counter-memory, power, he interprets human history as a cyclical process that leads from domination to domination. As Bart Moore-Gilbert points out in Postcolonial theory, in contrast to Foucault's pessimistic representations of the operations of power, Gramsci — as a Marxist — envisons the possibility of (self-)liberation for subaltern and "emergent" groups and the overthrow of the traditionally hegemonic orders. While in a number of contemporary theoretical writings an engagement with Foucault's work has helped reshape notions of power and dominance, the influence of Jacques Derrida has legitimized a shift in focus from the centre to the margins. As Derrida informs us,

I do not 'concentrate' in my reading [...] either exclusively or primarily on those points that appear to be most 'important', 'central', 'crucial'. Rather I deconcentrate, and it is the secondary, eccentric, lateral, marginal, parasitic, borderline cases which are 'important' to me. 19

In this passage, Derrida may not directly endorse Foucault's fatalistic vision of a never-ending dominant, but elsewhere he cautions us that directly oppositional or confrontational modes of decentering the centre can simultaneously recreate it. 20

In recent postcolonial theory, a fusion of Foucauldian approaches to power and a poststructuralist emphasis on the decentered, the fragmented and the heterogeneous has led to both an increase in the importance of marginality and difficulty envisioning an end to the dominant. In this context, interpretations of the role of those who inhabit the margins undergo a transformation. In Some provisional speculations on the critique of 'Resistance' literature, Benita Parry draws our attention to Trotsky who 'scorned the notion of a proletarian culture since the proletariat would be abolished on the attainment of a classless society'. 21 For Frantz Fanon, as Jean-Paul Sartre made clear in his Preface to The wretched of the earth, the importance of the peasantry did not lie in alleged virtues of marginality, but in the fact that, due to their exclusion, they were the most radically revolutionary forces of a colonized people, and therefore an important component in the creation of a society where no one lives on the margins. 22 In contrast, Dipesh Chakrabarty has criticized the early Subaltern Studies project for its Marxist focus on the marginalized as a source of transformative potential:

In pedagogic histories, it is the subaltern's relationship to the world that ultimately calls for improvement. Subaltern Studies, the series, was founded within this gesture. Guha's insurgent peasants, for instance, fall short in their understanding of what is required for a 'comprehensive' reversal of relations of power in an exploitative society. 23

For Chakrabarty, it is time to move beyond an approach that imposes 'universal' narratives of social and political transformation. The future of Subaltern Studies lies instead in acknowledging the importance of the fragmented and the marginal — in short, the decentered subject — and allowing the subaltern position to... challenge our own conceptions of what is universal. In the terms of such an approach, marginality is no longer to be condemned or transcended (as is insisted in narratives of liberation), but to be privileged in relation to its distance from the centre. Consequently, it is no longer simply difficult to envisage a means by which the subaltern can transcend subalternity, but undesirable.

This fundamental change in theoretical perspectives has coincided with a shift of interest away from the category of elite/subaltern in favour of the (sometimes) related category of modern/non-modern. Both sets of categories — elite/subaltern and modern/non-modern — function to disrupt Manichean models of colonized societies based on an overly simplistic dichotomy between the colonizer and the colonized. Within the terms of subalternist historiography, the word 'elite' incorporates both colonizers and nationalists, while the 'modern' refers to both colonial modernity and anti-colonial nationalist modernity. Notwithstanding these similarities, a number of important changes in approach have accompanied this thematic shift: First, the concept of subaltern resistance is to be replaced by that of non-modern resistance. This is a transformation that has significant repercussions for the conceptualization of resistance. Second, as Chatterjee points out in The nation and its fragments, it is not only the subaltern/non-modern that is now to be the focus of Subaltern Studies, but the relationship between this domain and the domain of the elite/modern; a relationship that is invariably understood by Chatterjee and others to be irreconcilably antagonistic.

This shift in focus towards an interest in colonial modernity and anti-colonial nationalist modernity includes an analysis of both the particular forms that capitalism takes in colonial societies and the related attempt by imperialists and nationalists to modernize civil and domestic society. This new subject-matter might seem to suggest that the Subaltern Studies group has moved away from one of its original intentions: to assert an autonomous subaltern domain separate to that of the state and elite politics. According to Chatterjee, however, the Subaltern Studies project has always involved two tasks. The subaltern and elite were to be identified as occupying two separate political domains: the domain of elite politics, which moves within the institutional processes of the state forms introduced by colonial rule; and the domain of subaltern politics, which is incomprehensible from the standpoint of elite politics. Once the existence of these two separate spheres had been established, the Subaltern Studies project would demonstrate how these domains are actually interlinked. The recent shift of interest to anti-colonial nationalist modernity, and what is described as the fragmented resistances to its normalizing project, suggests that the first of these tasks is considered to be complete.

---

26 Lloyd, Ireland after history, 98.
As a result of this increased interest in the idea of the non-modern in the work of the collective, the related concept of the subaltern has undergone a transformation. In Ranajit Guha's Preface to Selected Subaltern Studies, the word 'subaltern' in the title stands for the meaning given in the Common Oxford dictionary, that is, 'of inferior rank'. It will be used in these pages as a name for the general attribute of subordination in South Asian society whether this is expressed in terms of class, caste, age, gender and office or in any other way.29

More recently, Gayatri Spivak, resisting what she describes as the 'appropriation' of the term 'subaltern', offers a definition of subalternity substantially different to that provided by Guha:

Subalternity is the name I borrow for the space out of any serious touch with the logic of capitalism or socialism [...] Please do not confuse it with unorganized labour, women as such, the proletariat, the colonized, the object of ethnography, migrant labour, political refugees, etc.30

According to Spivak's definition, to be subaltern is not simply to be 'of inferior rank', but to inhabit a space relatively 'untouched' by the modern. In the context of this interpretation of subalternity, that is subaltern cannot directly confront capitalism or indeed engage with socialism without losing the basis for its inclusion in the category of the subaltern.

It is in Partha Chatterjee's early essay, 'More on modes of power and the peasantry', that we can find the basis for the Subaltern Studies approach which informs more recent conceptualizations of the term 'subaltern'. Chatterjee's piece, which first appeared in the second volume of the Subaltern Studies Journal and later in Selected Subaltern Studies, seems in retrospect to be a formative piece of writing within subalternist historiography. In this essay, Chatterjee sets out to explore the transformations that take place in the nature of domination and resistance in the transition from one mode of production and its related mode of power to the next. Since Chatterjee believes that transitions between modes of production have been sufficiently analyzed, he is more interested in the latter: transitions between modes of power. Two transitions are traced: from a communal society to a feudal society and from a feudal society to a bourgeois-capitalist society, with Chatterjee's focus firmly on the corresponding transition in modes of power. Greater emphasis, at least in terms of space, is placed on the first transition, from a communal society to a feudal society, and particular attention is paid to the notion of the 'peasant communal' mode of power. The term 'transition' is used rather tentatively in this essay as Chatterjee is keen to emphasize that one mode of power is never simply replaced by the next. In other words, the feudal mode of power may be the dominant one during the age of feudalism, but there will remain elements of communal power structures based largely on kin and clan. What Chatterjee's article suggests is that it is in this clash of contradictory modes of power that the space for resistance can develop: the resurgence of the communal mode of power, for example, generates ways to fight feudal power structures. The concept of non-linear transition, which Chatterjee claims tends to dominate narratives of modes of production, has been replaced by one of non-linear transition.

In this essay, Chatterjee's main concern is to provide a theoretical framework for the analysis of changing power relationships. For Chatterjee, the problem with Marxism is that it has provided us with a framework through which we can examine modes of production, but neglected the area of power relations and the process of legitimization of these power relations. This exclusive focus on modes of production has led to what he describes as a 'techno-economic determinism'.31 Without a means of understanding the relationship between communal, feudal and bourgeois power structures, according to Chatterjee, any analysis of how pre-capitalist forms and the modern state interact, especially in large agrarian societies, will be severely limited.

Chatterjee's primary task is to define three modes of power based on the allocation of rights over material objects and, indeed, non-material objects such as power, within a system of social production. The first mode of power referred to by Chatterjee is the communal mode of power where rights are allocated on the authority of the community, since in such societies authority is understood to reside in the community as a whole and not in any person or office. The second mode of power that Chatterjee discusses is the feudal mode of power where rights and authority are based on relationships of coercive domination. The third is the bourgeois mode of power where rights and authority are still based on domination, but domination no longer needs to be so openly coercive. Under this third mode of power, it is no longer necessary to have physical control over those who are dominated, as in the case of feudal serfdom. Domination is achieved instead by gaining complete control over the labour process. The institutional form through which this domination is maintained, Chatterjee goes on to claim, is that of the liberal democratic government.

29 Ranajit Guha, Preface. 30 Dipankar Chakrabarty's contribution to this collection of essays, Conditions for knowledge of working-class conditions, suggests how closely affiliated he was to the project, as defined by Ranajit Guha, at this time. 31 Spivak, Subalternizing Marxism, 114.

According to Chatterjee, it is the dialectical opposition between communal and feudal modes of power during the transition from communal societies to feudal societies that is the central dynamic of all pre-capitalist societies. In such societies, there will be two contradictory principles of authority, one which is communal and based on kinship, and the other feudal and based on domination. Chatterjee points out that the opposition between these two contrary principles is an integral aspect of political formations even in feudal society proper. Where these two contradictory principles co-exist, there will be an institutionalized sphere of class domination based on direct superiority of physical force and the concept of rank in constant opposition to subordinate forces that are seeking to assert an alternative mode of authority based on the notion of kinship.

For Chatterjee, 'the effective limits of domination at any point of time are thus the resilient at that time of this inherently contradictory process' (Chatterjee's emphasis).34 Feudal political formations are based on an opposition between feudal jurisdiction and community, an opposition that can allow for both domination and justifiable resistance. The extension of feudal jurisdiction in Europe, for example, prepared the way not only for the erosion of communal rights, but also for peasant resistance. Although a feudal mode of power tended to dominate, changes in law, particularly the recognition of communal rights in the granting of charters of liberty, suggest that the balance of power was neither fixed nor stable. Consequently, established ideologies in feudal societies were contradictory, even if notions of authority and legitimacy tended to be represented as a unified and consistent system of beliefs.

The emergence of the capitalist mode of production is accompanied by a new mode of exercise of power. As is the case in feudal societies, the continued existence of alternative notions of authority and power has the potential to demonstrate the limitations of the dominance of this bourgeois mode of power. Feudal institutions and forms of authority based, as is the bourgeois mode of power, on the concept of domination may, however, be appropriated by the bourgeois mode of power and consequently do not pose any great threat to capitalist society. What Chatterjee goes on to claim is that a communal mode of power, which understands authority to reside in the community as a whole, cannot be so easily accommodated in capitalist societies. Consequently, the establishment of bourgeois hegemony requires the dissolution of the peasantry as a distinct social form of existence of productive labour, and hence the extinction of a communal mode of power. In the terms of Chatterjee's essay, 'to the extent that a peasantry continues to exist as peasantry in a society dominated by capitalism, it represents a limit to bourgeois hegemony.'35 For Chatterjee, the importance of so-called backward, often post-colonial, countries is that it is in these countries that the dominance of 'modern' power structures seems particularly limited by the persistence of other modes of power. The bourgeois power structures in countries belonging to the modern period that have retained the character of large agrarian societies will, therefore, be weak and particularly open to non-modern resistance.

The importance of Chatterjee's work on modes of power lies in its ability to question the monistic notion of a static, homogeneous society. For Chatterjee, the dominance of one mode of production and its associated value system does not necessarily preclude the existence of alternative and, often contradictory, systems of belief. Seeking to undermine the notion of the totality of bourgeois hegemony, Chatterjee points out that the group least assimilated to capitalist values, similarities can be drawn between Chatterjee's work on modes of power and Raymond Williams's reconceptualization of hegemony in 'Base and superstructure in Marxist cultural theory'. Like Chatterjee, Williams was concerned to create a new framework through which the relationship between the dominant and the non-modern could be analyzed. Pointing out that in its present usage, hegemony has become 'simple, uniform and static', Williams wanted to 'emphasize that hegemony is not singular; indeed that its own internal structures are highly complex, and have continually to be renewed, recreated and defended; and by the same token, that they can be continually challenged.'36 Furthermore, Chatterjee's notion of a communal mode of power is similar to Raymond Williams's concept of 'residual ideology'. In Williams's work, residual ideology is defined as a value system that has outlived its own time, is unable to function as the dominant ideology in the new social order, but is capable of demonstrating the limitations of the ideology that is dominant. The main difference between these important reconceptualizations of power relations, however, is that while the framework Chatterjee outlines facilitates an analysis of modes of resistance, the theoretical model he utilizes in this process works to predetermine the possibility of discovering alternatives to that which is being resisted. Chatterjee's work, after all, may have an equivalent to Williams's residual ideology, but his work contains nothing, and neither does it seek to contain anything, that can be compared with what Williams describes as an emergent culture. The motivation behind this omission is to some degree understandable. To speak of an emergent culture capable of replacing the dominant ideology, in the terms of recent postcolonial writings, simply to suggest the replacement of one elite political formation with another. The emergent culture, whatever its origins, will become elite once it replaces the dominant ideology. The implications of the loss of an equivalent to William's emergent culture, however, is that William's triadic classification—residual, emergent, dominant—has been replaced by the dichotomy: elite (dominant)/subaltern (residual). With the loss of an equivalent to William's emergent culture, the domain of the elite/dominant has been expanded. Included in this domain is not only that which is overtly elite, but also the aspiring elite in liberationist disguise. This new form of classification allows for the dominant, it allows for that which can demonstrate the limitations of the dominant, but it has less potential to allow for the end of an elite political formation than the triadic structure it is replacing.

32 Ibid., 277.
33 Ibid., 168. 34 Ibid., 'Base and superstructure in Marxist cultural theory', 57.

While acknowledging, therefore, that the decentring of notions of power and the political has been of undeniable importance in rethinking resistance, I believe that this process has involved both an expansion of these notions in a manner that is of enormous benefit, and, contradictorily, an extremely damaging restriction of these notions. Only too often, what is actually demonstrated by the Subaltern Studies collective is the extent to which resistance (as defined by the group) can all too easily exist alongside a reasonably successful hegemonic formation without posing any great threat to it. In this context, Chatterjee's and Chakrabarty's rejection of aspects of Marxist thought may be more wholesale than they are willing to acknowledge. Gone with the scripting of Indian histories 'on the lines of some already-told European drama' is possibly the most important component of Marxism, the means of imagining the emergence of an alternative society. Earlier anti-colonial theorists such as Franz Fanon were to share Chakrabarty's and Chatterjee's concerns about overly simplistic applications of Marxist thought in the colonial context. For Fanon, Marxist analysis 'must here be thought out again.' The ideas of emancipation and liberation implicit in Marxism, which Fanon and other first generation post-colonial theorists retained but warned would not automatically come with political independence are now, however, dismissed as totalizing or 'grand narratives'. Consequently, emancipation, the implementation of which in Fanon's work is in abeyance, becomes in the work of many recent postcolonial theorists an undesirable elitist narrative.

Returning to Chatterjee's essay on modes of power, in order to understand how, for Chatterjee, the peasant-communal mode of power works as resistance, we should focus on his claim that a peasantry which 'continues to exist as peasantry in a society dominated by capitalism [...] represents a limit to bourgeois hegemony.' Responding to Chatterjee's thesis, a review article that appeared in the journal Social Scientist was to point out that in countries like France, Greece, Japan and North America small family farms 'take on the economic rationality of small enterprise dominated by large industrial units' and can easily co-exist with advanced capitalism. While raising some important questions regarding the relationship between the rural poor and capitalism, this article, based on a definition of peasantry significantly broader than can be found in Chatterjee's own work, could itself be critiqued on a number of grounds. To accuse Chatterjee of failing to acknowledge the 'peasantry' of France and North America, for example, is to assume that these small farmers can be categorized as peasants in the sense that Chatterjee uses this term. Furthermore, this review article ultimately ignores the fact that Chatterjee is primarily concerned with post-colonial societies that are still largely agrarian, the so-called 'peripheries' of the world where, he claims, the transition to capitalism is most incomplete. Then again, the fault might be partially with Chatterjee for not emphasizing this point enough and for failing to explain adequately in 'More on modes of power and the peasantry' the part that colonialism plays in his argument.

Elsewhere, in an article entitled 'Peasants, politics and historiography', he points out that 'fragments' of earlier structures survive in colonial societies because the particularly retarded process of capitalism that accompanies colonialism is incapable of destroying pre-capitalist forms. He describes this phenomenon as the 'logic of infirm capitalism.' In this essay, Chatterjee goes on to differentiate his approach from that associated with Lenin and Marx, for whom, he claims, the expansion of world capitalism was emancipatory to the extent that it allowed for a progressive dissolution of 'backward' modes of production and power structures. Chatterjee points out that for Marx 'incompleteness' in the transition to capitalism can only mean one thing—still to be completed. In Postcoloniality and the artifice of history', Dipesh Chakrabarty takes up this argument, stating that the idea of incomplete transformation is one of the dominant themes in the story of modern India. He describes this recurring narrative in its Marxist manifestation as the 'failure' of a history to keep an appointment with its destiny' and suggests that it might provide another example of the 'lazy native'. For Chakrabarty, a Marxist tendency to read Indian history in terms of an incompleteness or lack demonstrates the similarities that exist between this narrative and the transition narrative that was used to justify British imperialism. The Marxist concept of modes of production and the transition from one mode to the next, Chakrabarty tells us, has similar ideological underpinnings to the imperial civilizing narrative. It is not simply that each is a narrative of transition. The relationship between them is more than simply formal. In both colonial and Marxist historiographies, Indian history is a variation of the master narrative, the history of Europe. According to Chakrabarty, in this context Indian history, even in the most dedicated socialist or nationalist hands, remains a mimicry of a certain "modern" subject of "European" history and is bound to represent a sad figure of lack and failure.

The transition narrative will always remain "grievously incomplete".

In 'Peasants, politics and historiography', Chatterjee claims that we have a number of choices when faced with this concept of incomplete capitalism. We can continue to regard Capital as a universal category and, consequently, to explain "retarded" capitalism in terms of a time-lag, or we can treat 'retarded' capitalism as 'an expression of the historical limits of Capital's universalizing mission'. For Chatterjee, the importance of postcolonial countries where the transition to capitalism is most incomplete is that they can allow us to abandon a methodological approach that explains the emergence of capitalism as universal and put in its place a methodological approach that "enables us to identify and explain the limits to the historical actualization of Capital as a universal economic category" (Chatterjee's emphasis). In The nation and its fragments, he discusses further what this alternative methodology might entail. The e xample he gives in relation to the peasant is an approach that involves writing an Indian history of peasant struggle as opposed to a history of peasant struggle in India. The semantic difference signifies that these are in fact quite different historiographical projects. For Chatterjee, to write a history of peasant struggles in India is to write a history in which the historical material on these struggles is arranged according to the framework of a so-called universal history - the transition from feudalism to capitalism, for example. In contrast, to write an Indian history of peasant struggles is to look at the historical material and find in it a fractured and distorted historical development forced by the violence of colonialism into the grid of so-called 'world history'.

According to

Chatterjee, the object of this new methodology is not a reactionary one; it is do not to suggest that pre-colonial history can be resumed. It should function instead to contest and transform supposedly universal categories and to dem-strate the connections that exist between colonialism and Capital.

Chatterjee's and Chakrabarty's critique of narratives of Capital and the connections they form between these narratives and the imperial project is a good example of the techniques employed by the Subaltern Studies collective to undermine what they understand to be the universalist/Eurocentric assumptions that underlie Marxist thought. Reading Chatterjee's and Chakrabarty's writings on this issue, it is easy to sympathize with the argument that as long as Capital is regarded as a universal category, countries like India will always be understood (though not just by Marxists) to have failed to catch up with European history. Nevertheless, even if we were to accept Chatterjee's and Chakrabarty's interpretation of Marxist theory as a rigid, inflexible, eurocentric body of thought, so interconnected with narratives of imperialism that can be of little use to countries like India, it is still possible to question whether

Chatterjee's and Chakrabarty's demonstration of limitations is itself simply too limited to form an adequate alternative to what we are being asked to reject.

The colonial/postcolonial societies where 'fragments' of non-modern structures survive may not have fully succumbed to capitalist values and modes of thought, but neither have they remained ' untouched' by the capitalist world system. The problem with Chakrabarty's and Chatterjee's accounts of the function of subaltern/non-modern spaces is also the problem with Spivak's definition of subalternity as 'the space out of any serious touch with the logic of capitalism'. Emphasizing the importance of these 'spaces' for those who wish to reveal the horizons or limits of Capital, such writings fail to acknowledge that the subaltern groups who inhabit these spaces often exist in a subordinate position to Western capitalism. In other words, it is not always necessary to be in touch with the logic of capitalism to be exploited by the global capitalist system. As Swati Mitter reminds us in Common fate, common bond, capitalism is largely reliant upon young, non-European women, who are engaged in low-paid, insecure, assembly-line jobs in the so-called 'Third World' and an equally 'flexible', mostly migrant, workforce in Europe. According to Mitter, the fact that countries such as Thailand, Malaysia and the Philippines still largely adhere to 'traditional' values and systems of belief is interpreted by multinational companies as anything but an impediment. Indeed, it is often the promise of just such 'traditional' values and the corresponding lack of organized labour that courages TNCs (transnational corporations) to choose non-Europeans as their preferred labour force. The Export Processing Zones, or 'sweatshops in the sun' that are the focal points of the export-led industrialization policy of so many postcolonial countries allow 'almost total freedom for the investing companies from the fiscal as well as the labour legislation of the host country.

and an almost complete lack of freedom for the workers, who become deprived of employment rights and the right of unionization. Consequently, it is in the former colonies where Chatterjee and Chakrabarty claim that the transition to capitalism is most incomplete that the greatest level of exploitation associated with capitalism takes place.

In this context, the most significant limitation of Chakrabarty's and Chatterjee's work must lie in the fact that, unlike the Marxist narratives of modes of production these critics reject, the celebration of non-modern spaces they offer as an alternative fails to provide an account of historical change capable of ending an exploitation necessarily acknowledged in such writings. In contrast, Marxism, as Neil Lazarus points out in Nationalism and cultural practice in the postcolonial world, not only allows us to understand the extent to which capitalism has generated and deepened global polarization, it presents us with a means through which this polarity can be brought to an end. In Lazarus's text, which he describes as a self-consciously materialist intervention into an academic field currently dominated by a 'premature repudiation of systematic theory', capitalism is interpreted as globally dominant and, therefore, universal. Conceiving capitalism as a world system does not, however, prompt Lazarus to judge the histories of India and other ex-colonies against the 'norms' of Europe and find these histories lacking. For Lazarus, it is not that postcolonial countries have failed to catch up with the West, but rather that they, like the colonizing countries of Europe, have been shaped by their involvement in global economic relations: 'capitalism must be understood as tendentially a world system from its outset: in other words, what it inaugurated was a concrete universal (structured in dominance and unevenness), without an "outside"' (Lazarus's emphasis). The so-called 'peripheries' of the world where the TNCs operate are, in the terms of Lazarus's argument, 'infra-systemic' and, consequently, as much a part of the capitalist world system as the 'modern' countries of the West (Lazarus's emphasis).48

Neil Lazarus is not the only Marxist critic working within the field of postcolonial studies to write about capitalism's universal and uneven tendencies. In his work on Brazil, Roberto Schwarz, a Brazilian academic and activist, likewise retains the idea of capitalism as a world system, but rejects the notion that Brazilian society presents an earlier version of European capitalism. Schwarz, in a 1991 interview with Jornal do Brasil, described how in the aftermath of the 1964 military coup there was a general desire amongst Brazilian intellectuals to think of ways of rewriting the history of Brazil so as to understand the way that our backwardness formed a part of the development of modern society.49 As Schwarz points out in Misplaced ideas, Brazil was incorporated into the world market principally as a supplier of raw materials and cheap labour.50 The methods through which these raw materials were extracted can be contrasted to those associated with a capitalist mode of production, but this does not mean that they functioned outside the capitalist world system. The slaves upon whom the productivity of the latifundia was largely dependent were as much a product of this world system as the textile workers of nineteenth-century Lancashire and Yorkshire. What reading Schwarz and Lazarus leads us to question is whether the non-modern spaces that Chatterjee and Chakrabarty focus on in their studies of India are as antithetical to capitalism as their writings suggest and, consequently, whether the mere existence of these spaces can qualify as a form of resistance to capitalism. If the non-modern can belong to the same order of things (i.e. the capitalist world system) as the modern, the persistence of the non-modern is not enough on its own to counter capitalism.

Over the past ten years, subalternist historiography, as practiced by Chatterjee and Chakrabarty, has become an increasingly important source of inspiration for those working within the field of Irish studies and, more specifically, Irish postcolonial studies. The publication of David Lloyd's seminal Anomalous states can in retrospect be described as a formative moment. This was one of the first books concerned with Irish culture and politics to cite the Subaltern Studies project as a primary influence. More importantly, it was one of the first studies to demonstrate the benefits that were to be gained from the decentering of familiar notions of power and the political in the Irish context, in particular the extent to which this decentering could reveal aspects of Irish history that tend to be occluded or dismissed in more conventional accounts. Anomalous states Lloyd declares in its opening pages, will search within 'the historical work of the Indian "subaltern" historians' for 'ways in which to comprehend the apparent peculiarities of Irish cultural history'.51 While Lloyd is arguably the cultural critic associated with the Irish academy whose work is most indebted to this approach, subalternist historiography has also informed the writings of such distinguished figures as Luke Gibbons and Kevin Whelan. In the pages that follow, I will discuss the application of subalternist historiography to Ireland, forming distinctions between Ireland's and India's experiences of colonialism. Pinpointing the limitations of Chatterjee's and Chakrabarty's work and forming a distinction between this work and the ear-

48 Lazarus, Coming from nowhere (ed.), Matter estimated that at the time he was writing this book almost one million female workers were employed in Export Processing Zones. Of this figure, 76 per cent were located in South and South-east Asia.
49 Lazarus, Nationalism and cultural practice in the postcolonial world, p. 48 (ibid.). 50 Lazarus is responding to Anthony Giddens's analysis in The consequences of modernity of capitalism's western origins.
lier writings of the Subaltern Studies collective has provided the grounds for an analysis of subalternist historiography in the Irish context. Consequently, I will begin my inquiry into Irish subalternist historiography by demonstrating the extent to which David Lloyd's work, in particular his most recent publication Ireland after history, while undoubtedly an innovative contribution to Irish studies, is shaped by the damaging protocols and procedures that have of late tended to dominate postcolonial studies and the more recent work of the Subaltern Studies collective.

In his Introduction to Ireland after history, Lloyd defends the text against anticipated criticisms. His postcolonial study, which contains 'arguments based on the acceptance of Ireland's colonial history', will pose a threat to those who deny the claim that Ireland has been and continues to be a colonized nation. In anticipation of this revisionist backlash, Lloyd points out that 'the all-too-often unbalanced character of attacks on postcolonialism suggests a lack of intellectual engagement with the work associated with this approach. Lloyd targets Liam Kennedy's essay, 'Post-colonial society or post-colonial pretensions', as an example of a work that forms a critique of the application of postcolonial theory to Ireland 'with scarcely a single citation of any scholar or work and without extended engagement with any argument'. My objective in re-reading this critique is not to defend Kennedy's essay. As Lloyd quite rightly demonstrates, this piece of writing, with its privileging of data and failure to analyze this data in relation to specific forms of rule or modes of cultural differentiation, is clearly flawed. David Fitzpatrick's exhortation that 'statistics be used as a hammer for shattering Irish self-deception', has been taken overly literally by Kennedy who clearly believes that statistics on their own will suffice for this task. The problem with Lloyd's dismantling of Kennedy's essay, however, is that this critique, in conjunction with a series of comments aimed primarily at 'revisionist' historiography, deserved though they may be, disturbingly suggests that any criticism of his own work is likely to be ill-informed, theoretically naive, or based on a denial of Ireland's colonial history. What is not acknowledged by Lloyd in his Introduction is that it may be possible to accept Ireland's colonial status, work broadly within the parameters of postcolonial analysis, and still question the implications of Lloyd's methodological approach.

The work of the Subaltern Studies collective differs substantially from that of earlier anti-colonial theorists of subalternity and resistance and, as I demonstrated previously in this chapter, is informed by theoretical models and influences not available when Frantz Fanon's foundational postcolonial text The wretched of the earth was first published in 1961. These differing theoretical frameworks become all too apparent in Ireland after history when David Lloyd attempts to combine the liberationist politics of Frantz Fanon and James Connolly with more recent approaches to the issue of resistance. This unsuccessful synthesis, while demonstrating some of the thought-provoking ways in which the concept of resistance has been refashioned in the work of the Subaltern Studies collective, ultimately provides the grounds for a critique of this latter approach on the basis of the former.

As Lloyd points out in his Introduction to Ireland after history, the text is a deliberately fragmented work in which the eclecticism of subject matter (Constance Markievicz, Philippine banditry, The crying game, John Kindness's Ninja turtle harp, etc.) is matched by the fragmentary quality of the 'trials, essays and sores' in which this subject matter appears. In marked contrast to the academic who, from the start, is keen to point out that her/his work will build coherently to a conclusion, Lloyd informs us that Ireland after history will not 'furnish a sufficient methodology, or even adequate concepts, by which to construct a fully alternative historiography'. Even the task outlined by Lloyd, the construction of 'an archaeology of the spaces and temporalities that have been occluded', will be only 'fragmentarily performed' and will 'remain a necessarily disjunctive and untotallyizable venture'. Notwithstanding an elusive quality common to poststructuralist writings, Ireland after history does contain a number of central concerns, two of which - the non-modern and the state - I will explore in some depth.

In Lloyd's usage of it, the term 'non-modern' bears a resemblance to both the subaltern/non-modern space as defined by Chatterjee, Chakrabarty and Spivak in their work on modernity and Homi Bhabha's concept of the labile space of hybrid culture. In Gayatri Spivak's work, subalternity is 'the space out of any serious touch with the logic of capitalism or socialism' (my emphasis). Lloyd, in his depiction of the non-modern as 'a set of spaces that emerge out of, but not as, the dynamic relation to it', posits a domain that is similarly unassimilated, but like Homi Bhabha's hybrid culture, is more contaminated and less autonomous (my emphasis). These distinctions, how-

---

54 Lloyd, Ireland after history, 23. 55 Ibid., 8. 56 Ibid., 16. 57 Fitzpatrick, The geography of Irish nationalism since 1916, 13. 58 On an international front, postcolonial theory as practised by Lloyd has been challenged by a number of well-informed critics. See, for example, writings by Neil Lazarus, Saleh Ahmed, Mouihanin Roy, Dennis Barry, Stephen Sinfield, Helen Tiffin and E. Sean Jones, Inc.

59 Lloyd, Ireland after history, 6. 60 Ibid., 17. In critical works influenced by poststructuralism, proper weight tends to fall on any body of work that claims to possess totalising knowledge. In the terms of such an approach, the Marxist attempt to understand different forms of society and to explain their general characteristics can be confronted to epistemological dualisms. Lloyd's assertion of the intransitive nature of his own analysis is, therefore, less an acknowledgment of limitations than a means of situating his work within a body of thought critical of such 'totalisms'. 61 See, for example, Chatterjee, The nation and its fragments: the hierarchy of history; Spivak, Supplementing Man Mam's Rabbah; Distant Nations; 62 Spivak, Supplementing Man Mam's Rabbah; Distant Nations; 63 Lloyd, Ireland after history, 2.
ever, are submerged in a shared approach to the issue of unassimilated constituencies. For Spivak and Lloyd, resistance is to be located in unassimilated spaces that can only function as resistance in so far as they remain unassimilated and therefore, one might surmise, in a subordinate position to the dominant.

In Ireland after history, the central dynamic — or one of the 'knots' around which the text 'circulates' — is the relationship between the non-modern as resistant space and the state as dominant political form. Rather than being opposed to a particular version of the state, this text demonstrates what can best be described as a poststructuralist opposition to any centralized form of power. The title, 'Ireland after history', which Lloyd tells us relates to post-cold war triumphalism, could also refer to Lloyd's claim in Anmarnous marx that for both nationalist and imperialist historians the end of history is the emergence of the state. Consequently, for Lloyd the 'post' part of postcolonial refers not to the passing of colonialism but to the vantage point of critiques which are aimed at freeing up the processes of decolonization from the inhibiting effects of a nationalism invested in the state form. Interpreted in this manner, the term 'postcolonial' becomes a means of designating a select category of critical writings which share the assumptions and aims of Ireland after history. What is being suggested is that critics who engage in projects other than those outlined by Lloyd may not possess the theoretical credentials necessary to be considered part of postcolonial studies. Moreover, the fact that Lloyd's definition of 'postcolonial' denies any relationship between this term and the period after statutory independence suggests more than simply a critique of the limited nature of this independence and the neo-colonial political forms which countries adopted or retained after the imperial troops departed; it suggests that these events may as well not have taken place. Decolonization, according to Lloyd's definition, has little to do with nationalist struggles and wars of independence; it has to do with a postcolonial critic explaining to us why the anti-colonial struggles that ended formal occupation were of little importance.

Lloyd's interpretation of the term 'postcolonial' overlaps with that provided by Abdul JanMohamed, a postcolonial critic he has worked closely with in the prison notebook. JanMohamed refers to the two means through which the state maintains control: unmasked coercion and a more pervasive force through which a class or people are convinced of the naturalness of their situation and position in society. The first of these categories of control, dominance, is defined by JanMohamed as that which takes place before the period of formal independence and the second, hegemony, as that which occurs in the aftermath of this event. During 'the period from the earliest European conquest to the moment at which a colony is granted independence', JanMohamed tells us, 'the indigenous peoples are subjugated by colonialist material practices (population transfers, and so forth), the efficacy of which finally depends on the technological superiority of European military forces'. In contrast, the 'stage of imperialism that follows this moment relies on the active and direct consent of the dominated'. For JanMohamed, after independence — a term he places very decisively in quotation marks — there is a strengthening of hegemony whereby the colonized accept a version of the colonizers' entire system of values, attitudes, morality, institutions, and, more important, mode of production. Consequently, in JanMohamed's article, it is the moment of formal independence with 'the native obligatory, ritualized acceptance of Western forms of parliamentary government' that 'marks the formal transition to hegemonic colonialism'.

One of the main problems with the branch of postcolonial studies that shapes Lloyd's work is that it replaces one Manichean model of colonized society with another. In the writings of the Subaltern Studies collective, for example, the colonizer/colonized model is disrupted by class distinctions identified within the native population, but this is exchanged for a model based on the opposition elite/subaltern; a dichotomy that works to mask important distinctions between a colonial and native elite. Frantz Fanon's depiction of the colony as a Manichean world that is primarily divided into the categories of the colonizer and the colonized and only then divided into a native bourgeoisie, often 'whiter than the Whites', and the subaltern classes undergoes a reversal: for many postcolonial critics, the primary divide is that of subaltern/elite with the colonizer/colonized divide of secondary and often little importance.

The strategy behind the subalternist historians' interpretation of groups like the Indian National Congress as elite, and the neo-colonialist charge that this implies, is to some extent understandable. As Fanon predicted in his analysis of 'the pitfalls of national consciousness', anti-imperial struggles in colonized countries have for the most part failed to fulfill their larger promise. All too often, the national bourgeoisie, taking over the 'business offices and commercial houses formerly occupied by the settlers', became 'the transmission line... between the nation and a capitalism [...] which today puts on the mask of neo-colonialism. 77 Even in the context of these claims, however, the suggestion that there is no difference between a colonial and native elite and the corresponding conclusion that statutory independence might as well not have happened should be contested. As Fanon pointed out in 'The pitfalls of national consciousness', the defeat of colonial capitalism is an absolute necessity if colonialism is not simply to be replaced by neo-colonialism. Nevertheless, as is made clear in the chapters, 'Concerning violence' and 'Colonial war and mental disorders', in the context of the colonial encounter, racial difference ensures that the violence of colonial domination goes beyond that facilitated by capitalist social relations. For Fanon, as Ato Sekyi-Otu reminds us in Fanon's dialectic of expression, the originality of colonialism resides in the adamant bipolarity of the positions of colonizer and colonized, in this peculiar institution of difference lived as absolute contrary. Therein lies the "totalitarian character", the "voluntary" of colonial domination as racial bondage (Sekyi-Otu's emphasis). 78 In Ireland after history, Lloyd identifies Fanon as the anti-colonial theorist and activist whose work has formed the basis of postcolonial studies. 79 Lloyd quite rightly points out that in Fanon's analysis the independent state tends to be structured in accord with the ideology of hegemonic elites created by colonialism. 80 I would argue, however, that Fanon's critique of independent states was primarily aimed at those who he believed were prematurely celebratory in their positions of colonizer and colonized demonstrates that he did not share the tendency of many recent postcolonial theorists to fail to distinguish between a colonial and native elite and their subsequent dismissal of independence (interpreted by Lloyd as the capture of the state) as an irrelevancy.

It would be difficult to confuse Lloyd's work with Irish 'revisionist' historiography, 81 since it is clear that his bogeyman is quite different to that of 'revisionists' and, in some cases, to that of other contemporary postcolonial critics. The 'revisionist' blanket condemnation of nationalism and the nation has given way in Lloyd's writings to blanket condemnation of the state. Unlike many Indian postcolonial critics who, as Colin Graham has pointed out, share with Irish 'revisionist' historians a concern with the limitations of nationalisms, 82 it is not nationalism that is at fault in Lloyd's writings, but nationalism invested in the state form. An aversion to the state is likewise evident in the writings of Marxist critics, many of whom take their lead from Marx and Engels in The communist manifesto in arguing that politics in the form of an institutionally distinct sphere in society is the means through which class rule is perpetuated. 83 The problem with Lloyd's opposition to the state, however, is that it seems to be chiefly the result of a theoretical preference for the fragment over the central or total. This poststructuralist opposition to the state as a centralized form of power explains why for Lloyd marginality is not to be transcended. Social movements whose "very forms are incommensurable with those of a statist historiography" are claimed for poststructuralism: "The 'fragmentary and episodic' form of their narratives becomes [...] not a symptom of failure to totalize, but the sign of a possibly intrinsic resistance to totalization."

In a number of Lloyd's essays, this approach facilitates a critique of the work of Antonio Gramsci on the grounds that Gramsci interpreted the subaltern classes as emergent classes that would eventually be in the position to take over the state. 84 For Lloyd, Gramsci's mistake was that he interpreted the fragmentary aspect of subaltern histories as 'contingent upon its own fragmentary and emergent condition'. Gramsci is condemned for failing to understand that the 'episodic and fragmentary' nature of subaltern histories is an "essential quality" of that history. 85 Notwithstanding Lloyd's critique of Gramsci's depiction of emergent subaltern classes, his work does retain a transformed version of Raymond Williams's concept of the emergent. This does not mean, however, that Lloyd has adopted Williams's triadic classification - residual, emergent, dominant - as a framework for his work. Indeed, for Lloyd, no distinction should be made between the residual and the emergent as the residual is the emergent. It is in the 'survival of alternative social imaginations amid the ruins of shattered cultures and the traces of state violence' that the emergent nature of the residual is to be grasped. 86 Consequently, these emergent residual elements do not have to emerge in the sense that Raymond Williams gives this term. In Lloyd's work, it is their apparent discontinuities that are 'indications of alternative social formations'. 87

While Lloyd's version of the non-modern/subaltern is valuable in many respects, it suffers from some crucial limitations. Ireland after history is similar to recent Subaltern Studies writings both in terms of its poststructuralist slant and its related critique of any approach that only interprets resistance as significant 77 Ibid., 274. 78 Sekyi-Otu, Fanon's dialectic of expression, xlv. 79 Lloyd, Ireland after history, 4-10, 40. 76 Ibid., 45. 77 See page 14 above. 76 Graham, 'Limited spaces'. 78 Sekyi-Otu, Fanon's dialectic of expression. 79 Lloyd, Ireland after history, 4-10, 40. 76 Lloyd, Gramsci's insight into Violence and the constitution of the novel, therefrom comes; Nationalism against the state, Ireland after history. 80 Lloyd, Annihilation states, 147. 81 Lloyd, Ireland after history, 78. 82 Ibid., 84.

if it affects organized politics that relate to the sphere of the state. There can be no disputing the importance of this argument, especially in its implicit critique of narrow notions of the political. Lloyd's belief that Gramsci's concept of the emerging subaltern classes placed undue emphasis on the arena of the state is, therefore, at least in part based on a genuine interest in how the political is to be defined. Of similar significance is Lloyd's criticism of political and epistemological forms that seek to transform marginality so that it can become part of an already-formed whole. He is understandably concerned, perhaps, that in the context of subalternity/non-modern, the term 'emergent' can simply mean the refinement or assimilation of these elements to dominant values and social practices. Moreover, as an abstract argument, Lloyd's attachment to that which is intrinsically resistant to totalization is intellectually exciting.

Nevertheless, reading Lloyd, I am struck by how bleak his version of resistant elements seems in comparison to Frantz Fanon's analysis of the role of the subaltern in The wretched of the earth. Lloyd interprets his work as being heavily influenced by Fanon's notion of the 'sterile formalism' of bourgeois politics in newly independent nations. In Aznalezo statc, he points out that this is precisely the model that post-independence Ireland adopted. For Fanon, however, after decolonization, there was at least a possibility that a genuine alignment between subaltern and other elements could bring about a mutually beneficial transformation through which the subaltern would cease to be subaltern. The subaltern would not simply be 'refined' into modernity and assimilated into already-existing structures, but would become part of a process through which these structures themselves would be radically transformed. For Fanon, 'the work of the masses and their will to overcome the evils which have for centuries excluded them' was an essential component in the transformation from 'national consciousness to political and social consciousness' (my emphasis). According to Fanon, 'it is only when men and women are included on a vast scale in enlightened and fruitful work that form and body are given to that consciousness' (my emphasis). This process, Fanon stated, is the means through which bourgeois leaders could be prevented from imprisoning 'national consciousness in sterile formalism'. Lloyd must share Fanon's desire to prevent this imprisonment, but the discontinuities with Fanon's work are far greater than he seems willing to acknowledge. Stressing in Azemalezo statc that 'the larger movement of Fanon's own work [...] has been increasingly important in the writing of these essays,' Lloyd concedes that in one area his work differs from Fanon's:

---

As opposed to advocating the rejection or reversal of European nation-states. For both of these commentators, the problem is not retaL but while these colonial states were introduced by European imperial powers, they were never meant to be nation-states of the kind found in Europe. African states, Davidson and Lazarus remind us, were not copies of European nation-states. Instead, they were designed to allow the greatest level of exploitation by European nation-states. For both of these commentators, the problem is not that such states were centralized, but that they occupied a peripheral position in the global capitalist economy.

Moreover, it is quite possible to accept Lloyd's opposition to the state as a 'totalizing, centralized, and modernizing political formation, and still doubt the validity of an approach which in the terms of the theoretical framework it employs simply cannot provide any means through which that which is being opposed can be reformed or replaced. As I previously pointed out in this chapter, an ambiguous treatment of the dominant is common to all critical writings influenced by poststructuralism. Much of Homi Bhabha's work, for example, is based on an argument, derived largely from Foucault, that the most successful form of resistance is not necessarily an 'oppositional act of political intention.' For Bhabha, as Bart Moore-Gilbert points out, the emphasis is placed on 'contiguity rather than direct opposition as the most effective political position to inhabit.' As opposed to advocating the rejection or reversal of the dominant, Bhabha stresses the importance of infiltrating dominant symbols and orders. In 'DissemiNation,' Bhabha, citing Julia Kristeva's essay, 'A new type of intellectual,' argues that if a dominant power is directly opposed on its own terms or in its own language, it will simply be perpetuated. This argument raises a number of important issues, but its dangers and limitations should be made clear. The notion of resistance, as proffered by poststructuralist critics, may not perpetuate the dominant by opposing it through its own logic, but it is often based on a conceptualization of resistance that depends largely upon the continued authority of the dominant for its operation. In Homi Bhabha's writings, for example, resistance is consistently defined in the context of its relationship to the dominant. The acts of transgression, such as mimicry or the colonized subject's return of the gaze, which for Bhabha demonstrate that power and discourse is not possessed entirely by the colonizer, may prove unsettling, therefore, but never pose any serious threat to the dominant order. Much of Bhabha's work is based on the thesis that the most effective form of resistance is that which challenges all dominance. This notion of perpetual resistance, admirable though it may be, is, based, however, on a disturbing notion of perpetual dominance. In The Wretched of the Earth, Fanon stated that the settler's work is to make even dreams of liberty impossible for the native. The native, in order to liberate him/herself, had to learn to envisage a future free of the settler's oppression. Consequently, for Fanon one of the most important forms of resistance was the ability to imagine an end to dominance. At times it seems as if postcolonial theory, under the influence of poststructuralism, is in danger of completing this aspect of the work of the settler as defined by Fanon.

Lloyd's analysis of the relationship between non-modern resistance and the state form is shaped by the same theoretical influences that have informed the writings of Homi Bhabha and Gayatri Spivak. In Regarding Ireland in a postcolonial frame, Lloyd informs us that within postcolonial projects [...] a critique of state-oriented nationalism and their modernizing institutions co-mingles with the archaeology of non-nationalist or non-statist movements and formations which entail an entirely different temporal logic to that of the nationalist movement itself [...] Because they have not been absorbed into the logic of the state and its institutions, such formations have fallen outside the domain of history.

The focus of Lloyd's writings will not be the directly oppositional, but the elements that are dismissed by the state as irrational or without logic. The problem with this aspect of Lloyd's work, however, is that, in the terms of the approach which he adopts, the ability of these elements to function as a form of resistance is largely dependent on their continued marginal position in relation to the dominant. Lloyd, in his determination to avoid confronting the state through its own logic, constructs a model of resistance that runs the risk of posing no great threat to dominant power structures. Indeed, at times, all Lloyd seems to offer us is the vision of an unreformed/unreformable state going about its business more or less unaffected by fragmentary elements that often only have to be there to be resistant. What makes this aspect of Lloyd's work all the more unacceptable is the fact that the domain of the fragmented: the domain of the subaltern, the domain of the non-modern — while there can be no easy equation between these spaces and people — also tends to be the domain of the economically disadvantaged. Ultimately what critics like Lloyd fail to acknowledge in their celebration of the marginal and unassimilated is that marginality is a matter of class.

This failure is also evident in Homi Bhabha's embrace of 'displacement' as both a desirable human condition and a useful philosophical position. In his writings on this subject, Bhabha makes reference to the 'wandering peoples' who belong to neither the countries of their birth nor the countries they inhabit. In such passages, Bhabha is primarily interested in the ability of the migrant or diasporic subject to unsettle notions of identity. Pointing out Bhabha's tendency to overlook class relations, Aijaz Ahmad quite rightly reminds us that 'most migrants tend to be poor and experience displacement not as cultural plurality but as torment; what they seek is not displacement but, precisely, a place from where they may begin anew, with some sense of a stable future' (Ahmad's emphasis).

As it is made clear in Edward Said's After the last sky, the approximately 250,000 Palestinians dispossessed during the establishment of the Israeli state in 1948 and those condemned to exile since then feel little pleasure in occupying the status of displaced refugees. 'Starless, dispossessed, decentered', Palestinians can be found throughout the Arab world, in Europe, Africa, the Americas, and Australia. Said reminds those of us who are conditioned by western education and culture to think of exile as 'a literary, entirely escapist option from where the colonized may begin anew, with some sense of a stable future' (Ahmad's emphasis).

For Lloyd, who claims that postcolonial projects have more continuity with the work of James Connolly and Frantz Fanon than with Euro-American poststructuralism, does not overtly endorse the critique of Fanon that Lazarus is referring to. Nevertheless, in a manner similar to these postcolonial critics of Fanon, he does collapse Marxist and conservative approaches into each other. Whether the desired outcome is 'an orderly civil society', a 'reformed state', or anti-socialist theorists in the field of postcolonial historiography. Social forms regarded as damaged, Lloyd states, can 'represent resources for alternative projects'. In the marginalized forms of lived social relations, he goes on to argue, it may be possible to locate 'the contours of radical imaginaries'. This is as close as Lloyd gets to Fanon's vision of the transformative potential to be found in subaltern groups. The vagueness that permeates the entire passage, particularly in relation to these alternative projects/alternative social formations, does little to reassure me; however, that Lloyd has any idea what these alternatives might be, how they might be reached, or, more importantly, whether he even considers these to be appropriate questions. Lloyd's approach to the issue of the colonial state may, as he claims, be heavily influenced by Fanon's Marxist-based critique of decolonizing countries, but it is a poststructuralist version of that critique. The result of these differing theoretical co-ordinates is that the revolutionary elements of Fanon's work are transformed by Lloyd into resistant elements. In other words, in Lloyd's work, these elements can demonstrate the limitations of a dominant power structure. They can even at times openly resist such a structure. Reading Fanon through a poststructuralist lens, however, invariably results in the erasure of his writings. For Lloyd, to have as an ultimate goal the replacement of a dominant power structure with a fairer system is to run the risk of simply replicating the dominant.

In an analysis of recent reactions to Frantz Fanon's work, Neil Lazarus informs us that 'post-revolutionary socialism' is an irrelevancy. Lloyd tells us, as all are an attempt to find closure in the reconciliation and resolution of contradiction.7

Lloyd differs from many other contemporary theorists working within the academic field of postcolonial studies by not including nationalism in this list of closure-seeking approaches.8 This omission is particularly noteworthy as generally in the terms of the postcolonial approach adopted by Lloyd, all nationalist projects are equally to be disparaged. As Ajit Ahmad points out, postcolonial critiques of nationalism no longer distinguish, in any foregrounding way, between the progressive and retrograde forms of nationalism with reference to particular histories.9 Ideological differences between various nationalisms tend to be disregarded in favour of the argument that all nationalist projects, conservative or revolutionary, bourgeois or socialist, are alike to the extent that they are prone to appropriation and, therefore, automatically coercive. In such writings, Neil Lazarus tells us, nationalism is interpreted primarily as 'a mode of representation' and, consequently, 'viewed as an elitist cultural practice in which subaltern classes are represented — spoken for — in the name of a nation which is, supposedly, themselves' (Lazarus's emphasis).10 In Gayatri Spivak's work, for example, all nationalist discourses are equally at fault in that their claim to speak for others necessarily involves the silencing of those others.11 In this context, Frantz Fanon's distinction between the 'crowning imposture' that of 'speaking in the name of the silenced nation' and the 'leader who is in fact the authentic mouthpiece of the colonized masses' is itself to be dismissed as an act of appropriation.12 Likewise Ranajit Guha's analysis of why Indian nationalists failed 'to speak for the nation' (his emphasis) with the related suggestion in note 14 and 15 of the essay 'On some aspects of Indian historiography of colonial India' that, under different circumstances, this failure could have been a success, is transformed by Spivak and other postcolonial theorists into an analysis of why this outcome could never have been possible.13

It is not that Lloyd bends the postcolonial framework to exclude nationalism from the list of repudiated projects (though he does seem less concerned with the representational aspect of this debate than many of his contemporaries); on the contrary, what Lloyd sets out to do is to provide us with examples of nationalisms that are not statist and therefore, according to Lloyd, do not seek closure. One of the more interesting aspects of this exercise is Lloyd's extension of the definition of nationalism beyond that which can usually be found in conventional historiography to include what are most often referred to as proto-nationalisms. For Lloyd, the fact that such nationalisms are understood by Eli Habshawn and, in the Irish context, Tom Garvin to have failed to evolve or to be in the process of evolving into full nationalisms demonstrates their non-statist orientation. A less successful example of non-statist nationalism cited by Lloyd are the ideas propounded by the socialist feminist Countess Markievicz, whose opposition to the conservative nature of the Irish Free State government does not, as he sees it, necessarily imply that she would not have supported a different kind of state. Lloyd travels to the Philippines to provide an example of non-statist nationalism outside the Irish context. For Lloyd, the radical name of the Philippine anti-colonial left is to be located in its acknowledgment of local cultural forms. This engagement with the local, however, does not mean, as Lloyd is forced to admit, that the Philippine left had no interest in the arena of the state. What is of particular interest in Lloyd's search for non-statist nationalisms, which, with perhaps the exception of 'proto-nationalisms', invariably turn out to be nationalisms which may have an interest in the state but combine this interest with a strong social and economic agenda, is that it is in this very search that Lloyd, often by default, comes closest to the notion of a nationalism capable of radically transforming the state.

Lloyd's non-statist critique of the state is admirable in its attempt to avoid the pitfalls of direct opposition. As Neil Lazarus points out, however, 'colonialism cannot be overturned except through anti-colonial struggle; and in a world of nations, the colonial state cannot be captured and appropriated except as a nation-state' (Lazarus's emphasis).14 An anti-colonial challenge to colonial power must take place within the domain of the colonial state if it is to result in political independence. The independence achieved may for this reason be limited, but surely a resistance that took place outside the domain of the state, never became dominant and therefore never led to political independence would have been even more limited. As Ranajit Guha points out in 'On some aspects of the historiography of colonial India', the 'initiatives which originated from the domain of subaltern politics were not, on their part, powerful enough to develop the nationalist movement into a full-fledged struggle for national liberation'. Furthermore Frantz Fanon, while keen to demonstrate that without subaltern resistance anti-colonial struggle had little point, was also to claim

7 Lloyd, Ireland after 1867, 67.
8 Such prominent postcolonial theorists as Eli Habshawn, Partha Chatterjee, Dipankar Chakrabarty and Gayatri Spivak have considered both colonial and anti-colonial nationalism in their writings. Consequently, for the Irish postcolonial critic, Colin Graham, the importance of 'post-colonialism, through its most contemporary theorists, is its ability to act as a critique upon, rather than impose on, the ideology of nationalism' Graham, 'Nationalism', 40. 9 Ahmad, In theory, 58. 10 Lazarus, Nationalism and colonial justice in the postcolonial world, 69, 89. 11 See, for example, Spivak, Can the subaltern speak?. 12 Fanon, The wretched of the earth, 57. 13 Ranajit Guha, 'On some aspects of the historiography of colonial India', 40.
that with resistance which remained purely within the subaltern domain 'you won't win a national war, you'll never overthrow the terrible enemy machine'.

David Lloyd, whose interest in Countess Markievicz lies in her 'antagonism to centralization and leadership', cites in 'Nationalisms against the state' the following passage from Markievicz's Prison letters:

There was something that prevented any man or woman ever desiring to conquer all Ireland - a sort of feeling for 'decentralization' (modern 'societies') [...] It's very curious, for in a way it was that prevented the conquest of Ireland, till the English enemy got rid of every family of note at the same time it always prevented the Irish getting together under one head for long enough to do more than win a battle.69

In this passage, Markievicz notes that, in the context of colonialism, the absence of a centralized form of power has both positive and negative implications. In 'Nationalisms against the state', Lloyd focuses on the first section of this quote.
As Lloyd indicates, for Markievicz, this absence is positive to the extent that it prevented British colonialism from subduing Ireland 'through seizure of a seat of government or an acknowledged single leader'.70 For Markievicz, however, Ireland's feeling for 'decentralization' also worked as an impediment, allowing the Irish to resist colonialism, but making it difficult for them to end it.
More importantly, however, these events are interpreted, they are essentially irreversible: for many countries around the world, including the southern part of Ireland, formal independence has already taken place and has done so within the domain of the colonial state. As I see it, an analysis of how once this has happened, liberationist aspirations might still be fulfilled is far more significant than an analysis of why political independence may as well not have happened and liberationist projects are doomed to fail.

In general, Lloyd's work, like the elements he tends to focus on, is resistant.
Primarily Lloyd resists the state and not just particular versions of it. Resistant to the state as he is, and having written a work 'dedicated to imagining [...] the alternative projects that will convert the damage of history into the terms for future survival', Lloyd employs an approach that does not allow for either the reform or replacement of the state-form.69 In the context of a number of recent postcolonial writings, to resist is to align yourself with the subaltern camp, to work towards a complete political transformation is to align yourself with the elite. Ironically, this never-ending resistance is just as statist as the approaches

69 Fenton, The world of the earth, 152.
71 Lloyd, Ireland after history, 25. 20 Tilly, 98.
revolution in The moral economy of the peasant (1976) to resistance in Weapons of the weak (1985), James C. Scott describes a growing pessimism that is, alas, not so much a prejudice as I think, a realistic assessment of the fate of workers and peasants in most revolutionary states—a fate that makes melancholy reading when set against the revolutionary promise. Lloyd's work shares a similar preoccupation with questions of resistance. In contrast to Scott, however, who interprets the focus of his more recent work in the context of a regrettable political disillusionment, Lloyd's interest in resistant elements seems to be primarily the result of an engagement with a specific theoretical approach.

In light of the objections I have been raising in regard to recent postcolonial theory and, in particular, in light of my critique of the theoretical model David Lloyd employs in Ireland after history, it may now be appropriate to return to Partha Chatterjee's concept of modes of power. As I pointed out previously in this chapter, the importance of Chatterjee's early essay, 'More on modes of power and the peasantry', is to be located in its exploration of subaltern/national history, could be condemned on the basis that we completely abandon Scott, however, who acknowledges why I believe it is important to seek resistant elements that elude the hegemonic. I do not think it is enough to simply show that these elements exist and that by existing demonstrate the limitations of the hegemonic. Studying elements that resist the hegemonic should help us envisage the means by which the hegemonic could be resisted in our own societies and, more importantly, should help us determine how alternatives could be created.

Furthermore, even if the failings of the more recent work of the Subaltern Studies collective were to be ignored, it is still possible to question the appropriateness of adopting this approach and unproblematically transferring it to an Irish context. While there are undeniable benefits to be gained from locating Ireland within an international framework and a number of suggestive parallels between Irish and Indian history, the concept of non-modern spaces and resistance should not be applied to Ireland without important qualifications. Ireland and India may both have been colonies and part of the British Empire, but the fact that Ireland's historical experience is that of a settlement colony and India an administration colony has a significance that David Lloyd, even though he does acknowledge that there are no identical colonial situations, ultimately fails to take into account.

In the mid to late nineteenth century, the authors of a number of pamphlets, articles and books sought to compare and contrast conditions in Ireland and India. In England and Ireland, for example, John Stuart Mill, questioning whether our own laws and usages, at least in relation to land, are the model England and Ireland, pointed out that India is the country which has best demonstrated that 'Englishmen are not always capable of shaking off insular prejudices, and governing another country according to its wants, and not according to common English habits and notions.' Mill concluded, therefore, that it is 'those Englishmen who know something of India [who] are ever now those who understand Ireland best'. George Campbell, although a Scotsman, was perhaps one of the men Mill was referring to in this text. Campbell, who had held various administrative roles in India, travelled to Ireland on a number of occasions in the late 1860s in preparation for his book on Irish property relations. In the resulting text, The Irish Land, Campbell pinpointed the 'cardinal mistake' of English rule in Ireland to be the rejection of Irish laws as 'nothing but "lewd customs"' and the subsequent introduction of English laws and of purely English courts. The existence in Ireland of 'two sets of laws — the English laws, and the laws and customs of the country was, for Campbell, the inevitable outcome of such a policy. In the dashing of these two systems, Campbell concluded, lies the whole difficulty.31

Campbell’s text, though primarily concerned with discrepancies between English property law and Irish custom at a particular conjuncture, provides valuable general insights into the workings and limits of English rule in Ireland. For Campbell, the invasive nature of this rule became apparent when it was juxtaposed to the system that prevailed in India: it was as if we had a large body of English colonists settled in India backed by English law and English courts.32 As can be ascertained from this quote, Campbell believed there to be two main points of contrast between British rule in Ireland and India: the sheer number of colonists in relation to the native population and the extent to which English laws and legal institutions had been substituted for those that existed prior to conquest. In order to shed some light on the latter of these points, it might be useful to refer to more recent assessments of the nature of legal control in colonial India. In Law and colonial cultures, Lauren Benton tells us that for nearly two hundred years of involvement in India, the British tried to craft a legal system that was formally plural and that allowed Muslim and Hindu courts to operate independently from Company or state courts.33 Moreover, as Ranajit Guha points out in Elementary aspects of peasant insurgency in colonial India, even after the British introduced relatively more modern legal institutions in the subcontinent, political arrangements at the village level were allowed in many cases to continue as of old.34

In Ireland, there was an attempt to impose a legal system intact, while in the early stages of colonialism in India indigenous legal forums were sustained as a means of promoting social order. As George Campbell would have been aware, during the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, numerous Sanskrit, Persian, and Arabic legal texts were translated into English in the hope of finding an ‘authentic’ body of law that could be used to govern Indian society. From his experiences as an administrator with an interest in ‘native’ law, Campbell was critical of officials in Ireland who had failed to acknowledge pre-conquest law and incorporate its concepts and practices into the English legal system. The extent to which in India the search that took place within the varied textual traditions of Hindus and Muslims resulted in the translation of ‘Hindu law’ into a form of English case law was, of course, not acknowledged by George Campbell in his wholehearted endorsement of the Indian colonial administrative system.35 What is made clear in Campbell’s writ-colonialism 'did not create new societies by destroying the native elites and installing European ones in their place'. This, however, has little to do with what John Stuart Mill interpreted as a greater respect for `native' customs. According to Cleary, administrative colonies (also known as colonies of exploitation) tended to be established where European powers found that they could benefit most by extracting economic surplus or valuable mineral resources from these lands without systematically destroying their traditional societies. Moreover, in administration colonies, settlement never occurred as the case in Ireland, 'to monopolize control of the land and to replace native political and cultural institutions with their own'. The indigenous peasantry was left in place, but was required to pay tribute to European landlords or political authorities in the form of labor or commodities. Settlement colonies were characterized by a much larger and more socially mixed metropolitan-affiliated population and in such cases the colonist and indigenous societies were much more closely intermeshed. Reading Campbell and Mill through the framework Cleary provides, we can only conclude that colonial practices in Ireland, though no more exploitative than those that existed in India, were of a far more interventionist nature.

In contrast, those involved in the establishment of mixed settlement colonies sought, as was the case in Ireland, 'to monopolize control of the land and to replace native political and cultural institutions with their own'. The indigenous peasantry was left in place, but was required to pay tribute to European landlords or political authorities in the form of labor or commodities. Settlement colonies were characterized by a much larger and more socially mixed metropolitan-affiliated population and in such cases the colonist and indigenous societies were much more closely intermeshed. Reading Campbell and Mill through the framework Cleary provides, we can only conclude that colonial practices in India, though no more exploitative than those that existed in India, were of a far more interventionist nature.

In addition to distinguishing between these contrasting colonial structural practices, geographical conditions should be taken into consideration. As Ashis Nandy reminds us, India was a country of hundreds of millions living in a large land mass. The cultural impact of colonialism tended to be confined, therefore, to its urban centres, to its Westernized and semi-Westernized upper and middle classes, and to some sections of its traditional elites. Subaltern classes in India were, therefore, far more likely than those in Ireland to inhabit space (economic, cultural and geographical) relatively untouched by colonialism, whether in the form of capitalist modernity or not. Given these differing conditions, the non-modern and the modern would have been more intimately in contact with one another in Ireland than they were in India. Consequently, it is questionable whether the particles of non-modern resistance which, for Partha Chatterjee and Dipesh Chakrabarty, only have to remain non-modern to resist, could have existed in quite the same way in Ireland. While non-modern elements capable of functioning as resistance survived in Ireland, this often enforced intimacy allowed for a very different relationship between the non-modern and the modern than Chatterjee and Chakrabarty write about in their studies of India.

At times, this relationship was more overtly conflictual than that described in Indian subalternist historiography. The cultural catalyst was that the displacement of Gaelic by English as the main spoken language of the rural population, for example, had no equivalent in India where even now only 5 per cent of Indians, mostly belonging to the upper middle classes, use English as their main means of communication. Largely precipitated by the Great Famine, an event which might best be described as Ireland's most traumatic experience of the dark side of modernity, this language shift and the accompanying transition from oral tradition to print culture was to have a profound effect on the remaining rural poor and the symbolic universe they inhabited. Since the seventeenth century, the Gaelic language had become increasingly associated with those who lived on the margins of society. As Declan Kiberd reminds us, colonial policy had ensured that the Irish language was 'removed not only from the world of politics and law but from government and high commerce'. The decimation of the Irish language was also, therefore, the decimation of what lay outside these modernizing elements. Consequently, in the aftermath of the famine's whole world of wakes, herbal cures, stories of kings and heroes, and legend of fairies - the culture of those who had not learned to read and write - became increasingly marginal. As Angela Bourke demonstrates in The burning of Bridget Cleary, it was still possible for members of the rural poor in the late nineteenth century to live according to a separate logic and belief system from the `modern' world, but they invariably came into close contact with this world as it impinged on practically every aspect of their lives. The modern and the non-modern in Ireland should not always, however, be interpreted in terms of a sharp dichotomy. The intimate nature of the relationship between these two spheres helps to explain why 'social boycott', a form of resistance that remained largely within the subaltern domain in India, was supported by groups as diverse as the rural poor, the commercial sector and the nationalist leadership in Ireland.

Taking into account these distinctions between Ireland and India, even Ranajit Guha's useful reconceptualization of dominance and hegemony may need to be qualified in the Irish context. Guha, in a study of colonial India, points out that recourse to the work of Antonio Gramsci and, in particular, to the Marxian perspective. Avoiding the conceptual dualism that forms the basis of hegemony relies on a belief on the part of those who are ruled that dominance, a pervasive force through which they have some say in how coercion was written into the law in the form of the penal code. By the late seventeenth century, after all, Catholics were only allowed to take up parliamentary seats if they were willing to take oaths against some of the central tenets of the Catholic religion and were, therefore, effectively debarred from parliament. Other measures passed in the eighteenth century removed the right to vote and to participate in local government. Coercive measures continued to be enforced in the form of 'extraordinary legislation in the nineteenth century,' but this century also witnessed the establishment of an extensive national school system throughout Ireland. During the same period in India, primary education of the children of the rural poor 'was left to the mercy and misfortune of local landlords who took pride in setting up schools on their estates but were careful not to encourage too much literacy among the peasantry.' In contrast to the importance that the state placed on the educational process in nineteenth-century Ireland, the colonial government in India, Ranajit Guha tells us, was generally only interested in the literacy rates of the middle classes who provided the manpower for its administration.

26 references pages 41-42.

The settler aspect of colonialism in Ireland also ensured that there was some attempt made by the settler, often landlord, class to hegemonize their relationship with tenant-farmers and labourers. Whereas the explicit targets of colonial hegemonization in India were the national and regional elites, the settler population in Ireland claimed to possess a bond with the rural poor inexplicable to the Irish middle-classes. Edith Somerville in her nostalgic work, Irish Memoirs, described social interactions between these groupings in the following terms:

I am not fond of anything about towns; they are full of second-hand thinking; they know nothing of the raw material and natural philosophy of the country people. As to caste, it is in the towns that the vulgar idea of caste is created. The country people believe in it strongly; they cling to a belief in what it should stand for of truth and honour — and there the best classes touch the peasant closely, and understand each other (Somerville's emphasis).

Due to a number of factors, aspects of this hegemonizing project ultimately proved a failure, but the fact that it was attempted at all suggests that the relationship between the colonizer and subaltern classes in the context of the triadic settler colony is quite different to that which exists in an administrative colony where the poor are likely to live at some remove from the administrations who inhabit the urban centres of colonial power. This is not to claim that there was no cross-over between Ireland and India, but to suggest that if the body of work associated with the Subaltern Studies collective is to be applied to Ireland, it needs to be modified so as to take into account important structural differences between Ireland and India.

In this book, I examined issues of Irish subalternity and resistance, particularly in the form of alternative legal practices, both in the light of structural differences between colonialism in Ireland and India and in the context of a desire to provide a credible alternative to approaches currently predominant in postcolonial studies. This alternative approach was enabled not by poststructuralism but by what I believe to be a more powerful analytic framework for understanding social processes and for creating feasible agencies of change — the Marxist perspective. Aking the conceptual dualism that forms the basis for the dichotomy modern/non-modern, I demonstrated that while the minds of the subaltern groups may have differed from those outside these groups, such differences are best charted not in terms of a sharp dichotomy, but in terms of a sloping trend line linking these social poles. This graduated model allows for a greater degree of fluidity and interconnections between these groupings and can provide a means of pinpointing the moments of revolutionary

50 As the beginning of the eighteenth century, Catholics who took oaths of allegiance and abjuration could continue to vote. This right was removed by legislation passed in 1728. 51 During the 1830s, for example, a number of coercive acts were introduced into the statute books: the Protection of Persons and Property (Ireland) Act, 1843; the Poorest Protection (Ireland) Act, 1844; the Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Act, 1844; the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Acts 1857. 52 Guha, Elementary essays. 53 See ibid.

54 Somerville, Irish Memoirs, 121-22.
potentialities that I was chiefly concerned to explore. These moments occur when co-operative forms of resistance develop that are neither elite nor subaltern, modern nor non-modern. Such forms of resistance can be described as emergent in that they pose a direct threat to the dominant and are capable of working as an alternative to the dominant, without simply replicating the dominant. It is the recuperation of the concept of the emergent and the restoration of the revolutionary potential of the resistant, therefore, that has been my primary concern in this book.

Bibliography

MANUSCRIPTS AND PAPERS

Irish Folklore Commission manuscripts, UCD.
Land League papers, NLI.
Michael Davitt papers, TCD.
National Land League papers, NLI.
William O’Brien papers, NLI.

ACTS OF PARLIAMENT

Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act (1 Aug. 1870), 33 & 34 Vict., c. 46.
Protection of Person and Property (Ireland) Act (2 Mar. 1881), 44 & 45 Vict., c. 4.

OFFICIAL REPORTS

Report of her majesty’s commissioners of inquiry into the working of the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, and the acts amending the same (Bessborough Commission), [C1737], HC 1881, xviii, 1.
Report of the royal commission on the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, and the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1885, [C1869], HC 1897, xxvii, 1.

REPORTS

Reports from the solicitor-general, the number of cases of boycott, and the number of persons wholly and partially boycotted throughout Ireland, on 31st July 1887 and on 31st January 1888, HC 1888, lxix, 287.

A return of the number of cases of persons boycotted throughout Ireland on the undermentioned dates [30 June 1897–28 Feb. 1909], HC 1909 (116), xxii, 7.

NEWSPAPERS AND PERIODICALS

Cork Examiner
Cork Examiner
Fermanagh Journal and Daily Commercial Advertiser Irish News
Irish Times
Irish Times
Kildare Observer
Limerick Leader
Newry News
Times
Tipperary Vindicator
Waterford Daily Mail
Primary texts are signalled by an asterisk.

Ahmad, A. In theory: drone, nation, literature (London, 1992).*

Amin, S., G. Arrighi, A.G. Frank and I. Wallerstein. Transforming the revolutionary social movements and the world-system (New York, 1990).*

Anon. The Plan of Campaign illustrated: an account of the Poorhouse, Kingston, Llandudno, O'Grady and Bewрюke (Dublin, 1883).*

Armstrong, N. Desire and domestic fiction: a political history of the novel (Oxford, 1982).*

Bakhtin, M. Rabelais and his world, trans. by H. Iswolsky (Bloomington, 1984).*

Barrington, Sir J. Personal sketches of his own times, vol. 2 (London, 1827).*

Barron, M. Banast and power: the Whiskey movement and their control in pre-Famine Ireland (Brighton, 1986).*

Bercowska-Jones, M. Twilight of the Aristocracy (London, 1987).*

Benton, L. Law and colonial culture: legal regimes in world history, 1400–1900 (Cambridge, 2002).*

— Of minority and the ambivalence of colonial discourse", Omen, 28 (Spring 1984), 119-33. [14]

Bodkin, M.M. The devil's work in the Clare contingent (London, 1890).*

— Revolution of an Irish judge: press, bar and parliament (London, 1912).*

Bourke, A. The burning of Bridget Cleary: a true story (New York, 1999).*

Boyce, J.H. Molly Malone: an episode in Dublin life (London, 1912).*

Boyce, J.H. Molly Malone: an episode in Dublin life (London, 1912).*

Boyle, E. Ireland's literary emotions [1966] (New York, 1988).*

Brennan, L. "She was a part of it": Emily Lawless (1845–1913) (London, 1987), 199-311.

Bronte, C. Jane Eyre ([1847] London, 1977).*

— Land, politics and nationalism: a study of the Irish land question (Dublin, 1996).*

— The Irish novel: a critical history (Dublin, 1988).*

Cairns, D. and S. Richards, Writing Ireland: colonialism, nationalism and culture (Manchester, 1988).*

— Historical themes and law (Oxford, 1985).*

——— ‘Gender studies and the colonial state: Irish women writers’ in M. Kelly and J.H. Murphy (eds.), Gender perspectives in nineteenth-century Irish public and private spheres (Dublin, 1997), 25–73.

Connelly, J. Eisen’s hope, the end and the present (1897) (Dublin, 1998).*

Crossman, V. Politics, law and order in nineteenth-century Ireland (Dublin, 1996).*

Crotty, R. Ireland in crisis: a study in capitalist colonial underdevelopment (Dublin, 1986).*

Curtis, J.R. The Irish in America: a study in mass migration and cultural assimilation (Washington, 1971).*

— "The year in Ireland" (Cork, 1978).*

Davidson, B. The black man’s burden: Africa and the curse of the nation-state (London, 1992).*

Campbell, G. The Irish land (London, 1869).*

Higgins, M.O. and vat,ona Leerssen, Lazarus, Lawless, E. Lan e, Joyce, J. Kib e rd, D.
Kenny, C. The exclusion of Catholics from the legal profession in Ireland.
Kennedy, S. The imperialism of Keay, C. 'The exclusion of Catholics from the legal profession in Ireland, 1579-1829', IHS, 25100 (Nov. 1987), 337-57.
Lane, E. 'The origins of modern Irish nationalism, 1881-1896' (Cork, 1997).
Lawless, E. 'Hunting: a study' (Belfast, 1995).
Lazarus, N. Nationalism and cultural practices in the postcolonial world (Cambridge, 1999).
Leccesi, J. Remembrance and imagination: patterns in the historical and literary representation of Ireland in the nineteenth century (Cork, 1996).
O'Cullough, M. British high politics and a nationalist Ireland: criminology, land and the law under Parnell and Balfour (Cork, 1994).

O'Sullivan, P. Irish superstitions and legends of animals and birds (Dublin, 1995).

Parren, A. The tale of a great sham, ed. by Diana Hearne (Dublin, 1986).

Peel, E. Irish nationalism and British democracy (London, 1993).

Teltake, J.K. 'Irish peasant women in revolt: the Land League years', IHS, 52 (May 1993), 64-80.

Tilly, C. From mobilization to revolution (Reading, Mass., 1978).

Tyman, K. 'Irish authors and poets, II', Irish Fireside, xvi (1 January 1887), 22-33.
Index

Kosonouris, Mary, on: Dáil courts, 124-6
Kernicka, Julia, 'A new type of intellectual', 154
Laclau, Ernest, on: modes of production, 129-32
Ladies' Land League, 18, 38
Ladies' Prisoners' Aid Society, 18 land acts, see property Land Corporation, 72 land grabbing', see property
Land Law Act, 1881, 103-6
Land League, 17, 30, 31, 34-8, 40, 75, 78, 110-11, 121-2
Land League courts, see alternative legal practices land nationalization, see property land seizures, see property
Landlord and Tenant Act, 1870, 60, 105-6
Landlord and Tenant Law Amendment Act, 1860, 104-6 landlord/tenant relations, see property Land War fiction, 12-13, 43, 45-59
Latin America, 108-9, 112-13
Lawless, Emily, Harsh, 39-59, 60
Lazarus, Neil, 149n, on: the African nation-state, 157-9; capitalism as a world system, 144-5; Franz Fanon, 157; nationalism, 158-9
Lecky, W.E.H., on: Harsh, 43
Lees, John, 45
Lentser Leader, 19, 73-5, 79-80, 88, 90, 96
Levin, Vladimir, 141
Lewis, George Cornwall, on: alternative legal practices, 25; 'land grabbing', 30 literary revival, 44-5
Lloyd, Clifford, Ireland under the Land League, 16-18, 20-1, 25, 25-8, 76-8, 70-2, 76-8; on: people's hunts', 97; suspension of trial by jury, 41-24
Lloyd, David, 45; Anomalous states, 54-55; 145, 155-156, 157-3; on historiography, 135; Ireland after history, 146-63
Lukács, Georg, 46; on: the novel as bourgeois literary form, 53
Lyons, W.S.L., 135; on: boycotting, 32
Maamtrasna murders, 11-13
MacDonagh, Terry and Eamonn Slater, on: modes of production, 107-8
MacNeill, Eoin, on: property ownership in early Irish society, 67
Maguire, Conor, A., 125
Maine, Sir Henry, on: property ownership in early Irish society, 67-8
Malaysia, 143
Markievicz, Constance, 147, 159-60
Marx, Karl, 141; on: the state, 150-1
Marxism, 147n, 157-8, 169; and: historiography, 129, 131-3, 140-4, 162; law, 249, 104-5; literary criticism, 13-4, 15-9; the state, 150-1 mass meetings, in: Clifden, 16, Derry, 17; Dromahair, 117; Ennisc, 19, Newport, 117; Roscommon, 116;
Westport, 11-12
McCintock, Letitia, A boycotted household, 410
McMeekin, S.J., 68
Meath Hunt, 96
Mill, John Stuart, on: Ireland and India, 163, 169-6; property, 66n, 105

Milner, Alfred, 72
Mitter, Swasti, Common fate, common bond, 147-149 modes of production, 127-129, 136-137
Moor-Gilbert, Julian, on: hunting, 102
Muller, Sylvie, on: hunting the wren, 102
Murphy, James H., on: Irish women writers, 43
Nandy, Ashis, 166
nationalism and historiography, 139-140, 159, 161 in India and Ireland, 29-31; and the land question, 110, 112, 113; David Lloyd on, 150, 158-159; and subalternity, 15-16, 64
National League, 20, 34, 371, 38-9, 72, 121-122
National League courts, see alternative legal practices
Nehru, Jawaharlal, 50-1
Nenagh News, 118
Newbridge Harriers, 88, 96
no-rent manifesto, 371, 69, 121
North America, 141
O'Brien, William, 121
O'Callaghan, Margaret, on: Clifford Lloyd, 16-17; Sir Redvers Buller, 62-3
O'Connor, Art, 121
O'Donnell, Peadar, 121
O'Hagan, Lord John, on: afterlife of Brehon laws, 22-3
O'Hanlon, Rosalind, on: Subaltern Studies group, 131
O'Hara, Kevin, 120, 123
O'Sullivan, Humphrey, on: hunting the wren, 102
O'Sullivans, Donal, 99 on: involvement of army in police duties, 76; poaching, 90
O'Tuathail, Gearóid, on: land seizures, 120
O'Wiley, James H., on: Irish women writers, 43
Penal laws, 12, 24, 168
People's hunts', 90-3, 95; in Harris, 52
Political Prisoners' Aid Society, 18
Political Prisoners' Fund, 18
Political Prisoners' Sustentation Fund, 18
Postnaturalism, 165; and concepts of resistance, 132-3, 154-5
Richardson, Samuel, Pamela, 55
Richley, A.G., on: property ownership in early Irish society, 66-7
Ridgeway, Sir Joseph West, 161
Robinson, Frances, The Plan of Campaign, 43
Roy, Moshumita, 146
Rule of Law, 24-5, 58-9
Russell, Father Matthew, 43
Rylett, Reverend Harold, 111
Said, Edward, on: Palestinian refugees, 136
San Juan Jr, E., 146
Sankara, Thomas, 153
Sarkar, Sumit, on: Subaltern Studies group, 132
Sartre, Jean-Paul, on: The wretched of the earth, 133
Schwarz, Roberto, on: the Brazilian novel, 571; capitalism as a world system, 144-5 Scotland, 64, 104, 106
Scott, James C., Weapons of the weak, 135, 161-2
Sekyi-Otu, Ato, on: Franz Fanon, 150
Sentimental Studies, 150-1, 156; settler colonialism, 31, 129, 165-6, 168-9
Shaw, George Bernard, John Bull's other island, 113-15
Shaw, G.F., on: Hurrish, 43
Shawe-Taylor, Captain John, 110
sherriffs' sales, 73-6
Slacke, Captain Owen R., 89-90
Social Science Association, 22
Slemon, Stephen, 146n
Somerville, Edith, Irish memories, 81, 169
Somerville, Edith and Martin Ross, on: hunting, 81-4, 99-100
South America, 108
Spivak, Gayatri, 155; on: defining the subaltern, 136, 145, 147-8
Index

nationalism, 158; recovery of subaltern voice, 130; Subaltern Studies group, 131
St. Stephen's Day, 93-4, 96, 98-102
Stack, Austin, 124
Stephen, James, on: boycotting, 33-4, 36, 39-40
Stearn, Steve, on: modes of production, 109
Subaltern Studies group, 30, 129-47, 149, 151, 157-9, 162-3, 169
'surrender and granting', 12
Suspects' Sustentation Fund, 18
Tatgen, H. A., on: boycotting, 28
TeBrake, Janet K., on: boycotting, 32
Thackeray, William Makepeace, 55
Thailand, 143
Thompson, E. P., on: customary law, 23-5; poaching, 91; Rule of Law, 24-5, 58-9 Thorntull, Mark, Personal adventures and experiences of a magistrate during the rise, progress, and suppression of the Indian Mutiny, 17
Tiffin, Helen, 1461
Times, 15, 39, 47, 64, 124
Tilly, Charles, on: categories of collective violence, 161
Tipperary Hounds, 86, 88
Tipperary Vindicator, 118
Today, 112
Todd, James, on: afterlife of Brehon laws, 22
Townshend, Charles, Political violence in Ireland, 26; on: boycotting, 32
Trench, W. Steuart, on: 'land grabbing', 30; on: Ribbon Association courts, 25-6
Trollope, Anthony, The Landladies, 12-15, 43n, 80-1, 103-4
Trotzky, Leon, 133
Turner, Alfred, 63
Tynan, Katherine, on: Hurric, 43n
United Hunt, 88
United Irish League, 121-3
United Irish League courts, see alternative legal practices
'unwritten law', see alternative legal practices
Vanaik, Achin, on: Subaltern Studies group, 130-2
Wales, 104, 106
Wall, Maureen, on: agrarian insurgency and popular seasonal festivals, 99-100
Ward Hounds, 96
War Office, 76
Webster, Sir Richard, 63
Weekly News, 82
West Indies, 108
Westmeath Hunt, 93
Wexford Hounds, 88
Whelan, Kevin, 145; on: modes of production, 107-8
Whiteboyism, 25, 30n, 66n, 99-100
Williams, Raymond, 'Base and superstructure in Marxist cultural theory', 139-40, 151 women: literary representation of, 54-7; writers, 44-5
Wyndham, George, 110
Yeats, W. B., 112n; on: Emily Lawless, 43
Zimbabwe, 113