

Title	'Moral Neutrality': censorship in Emergency Ireland
Authors	Ó Drisceoil, Donal
Publication date	1996
Original Citation	O'Drisceoil, D. (1996) 'Moral Neutrality': censorship in Emergency Ireland'. History Ireland, 4.2, pp. 46-50.
Type of publication	Article (peer-reviewed)
Link to publisher's version	http://wordwellbooks.com/Magazines/History-Ireland
Rights	© 1996 Wordwell Ltd.
Download date	2025-07-17 06:59:27
Item downloaded from	https://hdl.handle.net/10468/3039

in Emergency Ireland

by Donal Ó Drisceoil

POSTAL CENSORSHIP OFFICE
(As imagined by our Grangegorman Correspondent)

The average Dubliner', according to an anonymous letter-writer to the Irish Times, commenting on the revelations about the Nazi Holocaust at the end of the Second World War, 'would not be persuaded even though all the hosts of Hitler's victims were to rise from the dead; he would only pour himself another drink muttering "British Propaganda"'. Such scepticism in the face of the emerging evidence was common in Ireland, and also in other countries which had not experienced the Nazis at first hand. The sense of incredulity was heightened by the poor reputation which atrocity stories had gained after the First World War; the horror stories about blood-thirsty 'Huns' mutilating babies, using bodies to make soap, etc. which featured prominently in Allied propaganda had been exposed as fabrications in the interwar years. In Ireland the credibility gap was widened because of the government's policy during the war, or the Emergency as it was known, of ruthlessly censoring all reports of cruel or inhuman treatment by the belligerents, and by the continuing insistence in many circles on viewing all oppression through the lens of the British record in Ireland.

Neutrality

Ireland (the twenty-six county state) was neutral during the Second World War. While this policy has subsequently met with much criticism, at the time it was an obvious, pragmatic and, in terms of raison d'état, justifiable policy for a small, defenceless country to pursue. It made sense to want to avoid the horrors of war, the state had no imperialist interests to defend and it was the policy which was least divisive in domestic political terms; less than two decades had passed since the War of Independence against Britain and the Civil War. It also served an important symbolic function as an expression of the young state's sovereignty and its independence of action, especially from Britain. This symbolic aspect became central and, though the authorities secretly co-operated extensively with the Allies, on a public level Irish neutrality was portrayed as impeccably impartial right to the bitter end. This public picture was exemplified by de

Dublin Opinion, October 1939.

Valera's visit to the German representative in the closing days of the war to express his condolences on behalf of the Irish people on the death of Hitler. During the war the draconian political/security censorship was central to this process.

Keeping the temperature down

The Emergency censorship was operated by civil servants under the Minister for the Co-ordination of Defensive Measures, Frank Aiken. It covered the press and publications of all kinds; film, radio and theatre; postal, telegraphic and telephonic communications. Its object, in Aiken's phrase, was to 'keep the temperature down', both within the state and between Ireland and the belligerents. This meant the suppression of news and views which, in the government's opinion, could have threatened domestic stability (political, social or economic), encouraged domestic partisans, or have given the belligerents any cause or excuse for questioning the genuineness of Irish neutrality or threatening its existence. This resulted in the severe curtailment of freedom of expression on domestic affairs (government policies, IRA activities, repression, strikes, poverty, etc.), and also on neutrality, the war and the issues at stake. Few escaped the censors' net, including government ministers and Catholic bishops.

The Irish authorities had failed to develop the state's defensive capabilities to a level whereby neutrality could be defended militarily. Aiken, however, defined propaganda as 'one of the most important weapons of war' and its expression in a neutral country, whether originating there or not, as effectively an act of war. Censorship, by extension, became a central measure in the defence of Irish neutrality. Because Ireland relied almost exclusively on Allied sources, particularly the British news agencies, for its news of the war, all war news had to be 'neutralised' (its intrinsic propagandist content, or intent, removed). This was not something which other neutrals such as Sweden and Switzerland did to anything like the same extent. In the first place, the media in those countries did not have to rely on belligerent sources alone for their war coverage because, unlike Ireland, they had their own war correspondents and news agencies which

Letter

FROM AMERICA

Vol. II. No. 48.

September 22, 1944.

CRIMES OF LUBLIN CONDEMNED

9 Congressmen Voice Protest

Nine United States Congressmen have demanded the punishment of those war criminals responsible for the Lublin massacres—by now, except in countries where news censorship exists, common knowledge, and the object of worldwide condemnation and horror.

The Congressmen, all of Polish extraction, are Dingell, Wasieleski, Sadowski, Okonski, Monkiewicz, Lesinski, Mrak, Gordon and Gorski. Their message to Poland follows:

"A few days ago Americans for the first time visited one of the extermination centers which the Nazis built in your country. They were experienced journalists representing the most reliable newspapers in the United States. They examined the human abattoir in Lublin. Reports of what they saw have been published by the American press, as well as in London, and by the now liberated French press.

"Our whole nation is horrified by the unparalleled loathsomeness of the crimes which the Nazis perpetrated in that camp. We Congressmen of Polish ancestry are going to demand that the United States Government immediately make investigation of the Lublin camp and all other extermination centers that Hitler and his followers, carrying out the grim prophecies in Hitler's book, Mein Kampf, built in Poland. We are going to demand that no stone be left unturned in the Allied effort to obtain the name of every participant in those hideous crimes, that every one of them be tracked down no matter where they may seek a hiding place, and that they be brought to justice and made to pay with their lives for inhuman acts committed on your soil."

As more and more stories of unimaginable degradation and cruelty on the part of the Nazis come out of Poland, there has arrived in the United States a letter addressed to the President of Poland. It was smuggled out of a Warsaw prison cell and was written by a woman detained in the notorious Birkenau concentration camp. Her number was 793,350. Her letter said:

"Hunger and disease, torture and suffering, have been responsible for the death of thousands. But there are things even worse than this—the dehumanization of all.

(Continued on page 2.)

New York Bishop Calls for Justice

Bishop William T. Manning, Protestant Episcopal Bishop of New York City, denounced the perpetrators of the crimes of Lublin in these words:

"American public opinion flamed with a new determination as the latest, the most horrifying, the most incontrovertible story of Nazi outrage—The Story of Lublin—was told. The sober words of war correspondents, confirmed by a thousand grisly details, shattered the first impulse to disbelief. Convinced beyond all doubt, outraged America called for iron justice for the perpetrators of the monstrous crime.

"The names of the guilty are noted. Punishment will be meted out.

"Hitler's goal is to involve the entire German nation so completely in his crimes that they must share the destruction that inevitably awaits him and his partners.

"The German people alone can save themselves from such a fate. They must decide to repudiate the insane leadership that has brought them to the present abyss of degradation. By unconditional surrender the German people can and must win their way back to spiritual health which will mean membership in the human family for themselves and generations to come."

A Washington Post editorial wrote:

"Horror stories are multiplying with great rapidity as the Allied armies close in on Germany from the west, south and east. Almost every area that is liberated has its own catalogue of atrocities.

From Lublin, Poland, come now well authenticated reports of the systematic mass murders for which the Germans' camp at nearby Maidanek has become infamous the world over, now that the camp is free of the enemy. Reporters visiting it find evidence of slaughter on a scale that leaves them baffled.

Germans are asked to shed their last drop of blood to save the bestial perpetrators of these crimes against humanity from the retribution that awaits them. Germans who have not shared the Nazi bloodlust must see that the war is being prolonged in a frantic effort to save the guilty from just punishment. There can be no other point in continued German resistance. The

(Continued on page 2.)

Carreau Has List Of French Victims

Ralph Parker, well-known New York press correspondent, reported recently that a list of 171 Frenchmen, murdered in Lublin's death factory by the Nazis, had been handed over to Roger Carreau, representative of the French Committee of National Liberation in Moscow. Parker said:

"The list, copied from the register of executions which is now in the hands of a mixed Polish-Soviet Commission of Inquiry, only represents a fraction of the French murdered at Lublin. It is an extract from a single document recording the names, identification numbers, and the date of death of 600 persons disposed of in one of the many slaughter houses at Lublin during the period of February through April, 1944.

"Paul Masure, who is twenty-sixth on the list, was put to death on February 14, 1944, in the Lublin death camp. His prison identification number is 5,335. Jacques Patin was killed ten days before. His identification number is 5,396. René Buisson was put to death fifteen days later. Identification number, 11,778. Paul Vivet was asphyxiated on April Fifth, identification number 5,175.

"The list could be continued for 150 names. The Germans keep lists of people they murder, with the greatest accuracy."

Ed. Wilcox, Warweek correspondent, wrote this comment:

"During World War I several stories were widely circulated, informing the world of the bestiality of the German army. One was of Belgian babies with hands cut off by brutal German soldiers. The story was a fake.

"The Nazis in World War II require no fancy press agent's job to shock the world. Their entire effort 'to divide and conquer' is based on a theory of ruthless extermination of 'inferior races' which includes the rest of the world.

"The Goebbels radio in Berlin was quick to acknowledge the mass murder of the town of Oradour-sur-Glane, in France, which the Bishop of Limoges denounced. But the Nazis expressed regret that they had 'made a mistake' and chosen the wrong village. They had intended to ravage Oradour-sur-Vayres, some 15 miles away.

(Continued on page 2.)

Thousands of pairs of children's, women's and men's shoes were found in the Lublin murder camp after capture of the city. The shoes were removed from victims for shipment to Germany.

This is one of many cremation ovens at Lublin, Poland, in which the Germans burned bodies of thousands upon thousands of men, women and children from all parts of Europe.

could provide them with independent reports and interpretations of events. More generally, these states had taken sufficient measures for the military defence of their neutrality and did not, as the Irish did, regard the creation of 'a truly neutral outlook' among their peoples, or a so-called 'moral neutrality', as either necessary or desirable.

The Irish authorities refused to allow the war to be placed in a moral framework. Neither side was any better or worse than the other; this was a conflict between powers pursuing their own materialist interests, an 'ungodly struggle' which traditionally 'spiritual' Ireland would stand not only outside of but above. Unlike other neutrals, a sense of moral superiority became attached to the Irish policy and this demanded that both sides be morally equated, that information revealing one side to be more cruel, inhuman, etc. than the other be kept from the Irish public's view. Besides, how could anyone, even the Nazis or the Japanese, behave more immorally than perfidious Albion or Godless Russia? (Even the term 'Nazi' itself was banned, as the official position of the German legation was that its use outside Germany had an adverse connotation!).

Atrocity stories

'While none are more easily shocked at human suffering as the Irish', wrote an Irish journalist in a dispatch abroad heavily influenced by the censors, 'they do not want to have their own experiences recalled and are determined to adhere to their policy of no publication of details of horror stories until the end of hostilities.' Thomas J. Coyne, the Controller of Censorship, declared that 'the publication of atrocity stories, whether true or false, can do this country no good and may do it much harm'. They would have given rise to 'sharp controversy' and, according to the editor of the Irish Press, had 'no other value than to inflame passions'. While the business of 'atrocity mongering' was notoriously corrupt, the levels of systematic slaughter revealed in the closing stages of the war in Europe, and verified by independent sources, made the censorship policy of unbending impartiality difficult to justify, except within the narrow confines of the system's own internal logic.

(Above) Frank Aiken, Minister for the Co-ordination of Defensive Measures, 1939-45. (Irish Times)

(Below) Thomas J. Coyne, Assistant Controller (1939-41) and Controller of Censorship 1941-45.

Reports of persecution and cruelty from across German-occupied Europe provided much work for the censors from the first stories of Gestapo executions of 'mental defectives' and mass executions of Polish Jews which were censored from early 1941 onwards. By the autumn of that year there were daily reports of German atrocities, perpetrated across the continent. In general, it was policy to remove all details of specific atrocities and to consider only general allegations contained in official statements or communiqués for publication.

'...but the Russians were as bad'

Atrocity stories began to arrive on the wires and into the censors in even larger numbers from early 1943. The majority of these reports concerned Nazi outrages in Eastern Europe where the 'final solution' was well under way. This continued to be the case but, ironically, it was an atrocity story from a German source which provided the censors with one of their largest single workloads in this area. In April 1943 the Germans found mass graves containing the bodies of an estimated twelve thousand Polish officers in Katyn Forest near the Soviet city of Smolensk. They had evidently been murdered by the Soviets, and the Germans, recognising its propaganda value, immediately announced their discovery to the world. All details were prohibited from publication in Ireland; the most that was allowed was reference to a German broadcast which alleged the discovery of the bodies of an unspecified number of Polish officers, said to have been murdered.

Suppressed items included an announcement of a requiem mass being offered for the dead soldiers. In an interview in 1979 Aiken cited the Katyn atrocity in an implicit retrospective justification for his wartime policy: 'What was going on in the camps was pretty well known to us early on, but the Russians were as bad—you only have to look at what happened in Katyn forest. There are photographs to prove that.' Gerald Boland, the wartime Minister for Justice, made a similar point, referring to those responsible for Katyn (and other Allied atrocities such as Dresden, Hiroshima and Nagasaki) 'having the cheek to try anyone for war crimes'. The point is valid, but revealed a continuing refusal to acknowledge the systematic genocidal nature of the Nazi project or the possibility that there was a qualitative difference in the overall behaviour of both sides.

Aiken did indeed know what was happening in the camps, as he said, and outside, as details passed through his organisation in increasing volume but were kept from the pages of the Irish press. Censorship policy remained rigid as the numbers of reported dead rose from hundreds to thousands to millions. Even official communiqués and statements from the likes of Roosevelt and Eden were shorn of all relevant detail and left as general condemnations of unspecified brutalities. Buchenwald, Belsen, Lublin, Dachau, Auschwitz-Birkenau—none could be allowed disturb the equanimity of the neutral Irish mind.

The Far East

Atrocity stories did not, of course, emanate only from Europe. The war in the Pacific generated a whole spate of such stories, as both the Japanese and the Americans and Australians, hyped up by racist propaganda which dehumanised their respective enemies, perpetrated appalling crimes. Both sides reported only the atrocities committed by their opponents, and the Allied media domination of Ireland meant that the vast majority of censored stories related to Japanese atrocities. An added dimension of this war from an Irish perspective was its impact on a large number of non-combatant Irish nationals, in the form of the many Catholic missionaries active in the area. Missionary magazines became a target of the censors; the editor of Ricci Mission News, for example, was told that 'the censorship does not allow hospitals, still less children's hospitals, to be ... about time you got back to your own job!

MINDING OUR OWN BUSINESS!

OUR business is painting and decorating. Last time property owners often put it off and incurred enormous bills for repairs later, owing to inadequate paint protection. Profit by their experience and let us paint your property NOW with White Lead Paint. It will assure you protection for several years. You will be helping employment, too—and to your own advantage.

N.B.—You can now have White Lead Base Paints with a Hard Gloss finish.

WHITE LEAD PAINT LASTS

IN WHITE OR COLOURS

WILLIAM JACKSON

PAINTING & ELECTRICAL WORK
3 UPPER RATHMINES, DUBLIN, S.W.6

Printed in Great Britain by I.P.S. Ltd.

An advertising leaflet seized by the Gardaí in May 1941 on the instructions of the censor.

shelled or bombed in our press by either side whatever the facts may be'. Irish Jesuit Publications were informed of the desire to 'prevent the publication of matter which might make it more difficult to secure favourable or even fair treatment of our nationals...'

In the early months of 1945 the treatment of Irish nationals by the Japanese was a regular feature in reports from this theatre of the war. However, the fact that the victims of atrocities were Irish, and religious Irish at that, did not in any way alter the strict application of censorship policy. In February and March 1945, for example, the censors suppressed stories submitted by the Cork Examiner and the Free Press, Wexford dealing with the slaughter by the Japanese of over sixty people, including students, refugees, priests and brothers (a number of whom were Irish) in the De la Salle College in Manila. The stopped Examiner story related the experiences of Revd. Francis Cosgrove, one of the eight survivors, who had lived hidden beneath an altar for a week, existing on the water from flower vases and Holy Communion wafers. An Irish Press story was treated thus (words deleted by the censor underlined):

Priests and Nuns at Mandalay Rescued—Priests, nuns and orphan children housed in a leper colony in Mandalay were safely evacuated after Japanese shellfire had killed one priest and injured four others...They had been congregated in Mandalay by order of the Japanese.

On 30 March 1945 the treatment of a report on the killing of four Irish priests in Manila provoked a strong protest from the American representative David Gray and created some controversy about Irish policy towards atrocity stories. The priests, from the Maynooth Mission to China, had, according to a US Office of War Information (OWI)-inspired report, been put inside a house and deliberately burnt to death by the Japanese. The report in the Irish papers merely announced the deaths 'during recent fighting in Manila', giving the impression that the deaths could equally have resulted from Japanese or US action or indifference to the safety of non-combatants. Gray wrote to the Irish Press and Irish Independent, quoting the OWI telegram giving details of the atrocity. This section of the letter was deleted before publication. This double censorship provoked an amount of publicity. Associated Press carried the story on their wires and both the New York Times and the New York Herald Tribune gave prominence to it; the latter used it to imply that Irish neutrality was biased towards the Axis powers.

German concentration camp, 1940.

'Neutral at the pictures'

Radio Éireann, the Irish broadcasting station, was state-run and so was kept strictly within the confines defined for the press. Film censorship was even stricter than that of the press; virtually no reference to the war was allowed and special newsreels, with no war news, had to be made for the Irish market. ('Mr. de Valera', according to the Daily Mail in 1942, 'insists that Irishmen shall be neutral in thought, word and deed—and also neutral at the pictures.') Theatre did not legally come within the remit of the Emergency censors, yet they still controlled productions through various indirect methods. In 1943 the German representative Eduard Hempel complained to the government about an upcoming production in Dublin's Peacock Theatre called The Refugee. The play featured a Jewish refugee from German persecution in Austria and contained several references to concentration camps. The Controller of Censorship suggested a number of amendments to the author which would render the play unobjectionable. In the eventual production the hero had become simply a refugee from Hungary while references to the camps were left out completely. Special Branch detectives attended the opening night in April 1943 to ensure that the play had been suitably neutralised.

Reactions

Exactly two years later the awful truth of those camps was being uncovered and revealed. An Irish journalist, in a piece for one of the news agencies about the first reports from Buchenwald in April 1945, wrote that '...the people here find it difficult to believe that atrocities such as those alleged in radio broadcasts could possibly have happened'. The Irish were not alone in this reaction. People everywhere who had not directly experienced the Nazis found it hard to comprehend the scale of the horror and the fact that it was the result of a deliberate and systematic policy. There was widespread disbelief in Britain and America at the reports from the first camps to be liberated (by the Red Army); eyewitness reports and photographs were dismissed as Russian propaganda. In Ireland the villain of the piece was always more likely to be British. Correspondence in Irish newspapers in the weeks following the lifting of the censorship on 11 May gives a flavour of the disbelief felt about the pictures and reports of Nazi atrocities. Some correspondents articulated the common view that such reports were the inventions of British propagandists. Such attitudes were not (in most cases) the product of pro-Nazi sympathy, but of the narrow mind-set which clung to the myth that British inequity and Irish suffering were somehow unique. The censorship contributed to, and also, in its policies, partly reflected this view.

One writer to a Kilkenny paper described the newsreel footage from Belsen as 'all propaganda' and alleged that the British had used starving Indians to impersonate the inmates. A Dublin doctor assured Brian Inglis of the Irish Times that all the evidence, descriptions and pictures from Belsen could quite simply be accounted for by a typhoid epidemic. Another correspondent, unwilling to face up to the uncensored reality, asked 'Why drag up all these unpleasant things? It's so bad for the children, life is sad enough without this beastliness'. Many Irish people did avert their gaze, for many different reasons, but so too, in the preceding years, did many across Europe who were far closer to the reality, and with far more serious consequences.

The censors claimed that the Irish people had been kept 'fully informed' of atrocities by means of belligerent broadcasts, the English press and the Letter from America, the bulletin distributed by the US legation in Dublin. These media, however, reached a limited audience, preached largely to the converted and carried the stamp of 'propaganda'. For the majority such stories would have lacked credibility until carried in the neutral press or on neutral radio. Frank Aiken and his censors ensured that this did not happen in the dubious belief that ignorance was the best policy when it came to maintaining a neutral world-view, if such a thing can be said to exist.

Donal Ó Drisceoil lectures in history at University College Cork.

Further reading

D. Ó Drisceoil, Censorship in Ireland 1939-1945: Neutrality, Politics and Society (Cork 1996).

R. Fisk, In Time of War: Ireland, Ulster and the price of neutrality 1939-45 (London 1983, Dublin 1995).